The responsibility rests upon us all

In the cartoon inset into this editorial, Dry Bones bids us to put on a happy face now that Purim is upon us once again. Although it is a colourfully depicted message, it is also a bit confusing, because it is the mask itself that conveys the sense of happiness, suggesting that the happiness, in fact, is only a mask. Indeed, it leads us to wonder what emotional state may lie beneath the mask?

But we don't need a mask to tell us to be happy on Purim.

Purim tells us to be happy.

Each year for more than two millennia, we have commemorated the story of Purim – Mordechai and Esther's triumph over Haman – in the same, uncomplicated, straightforward manner. We listen to the story of their triumph. We celebrate. We send portions of food to our friends. And we aid the poor.

The mask and the inevitably accompanying costumes are instruments of our celebration, much to the delight of our children and grandchildren. Our happiness is not an artifice. It is a deeply felt sigh.

The experiences of Mordechai and Esther depict a time-travelling truth that has tested the lives of Jews – indeed of all human beings – ever since history was first recorded.

There is evil in the world. There are people intent primarily on harming others, on tearing down what others have built up, on lionizing death rather than sanctifying life. The fact that they have their own boosters and supporters who offer explanations and suggest "root causes" for the evil, or who champion the relative moral merit of the evildoers does not – cannot – deny the existence of the evil.

As those very same millennia have taught us, the only response to the rise of evil is to resist it. The responsibility for doing so falls upon all of us, though it may be difficult, even terribly so.

This is the unambiguous message of Purim, of Mordechai and Esther's example and of the collective triumph of the Jews of Persia.

So we put on our masks and celebrate, confident and hopeful that there is no force that will defeat a people entirely and wholeheartedly committed to resisting evil.

Thus, to echo Dry Bones: be Happy. It's Purim.

A report by an international panel of historians probing the wartime activities of Austrian president and former UN secretary general Kurt Waldheim contained enough information to start criminal proceedings against him, according to Prof. Yehuda Wallach a Tel Aviv University military historian who served on the panel.

Transplant recipient thanks community

To the Toronto community: I am eager to share with the community the news of how I'm doing since my allogeneic stem cell transplant last July at Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore, Md. Three years ago, I was not sure what my future looked like. After I learned that I needed a transplant, everything in my life became even more uncertain. My family and I are forever grateful for the overwhelming support and love that the community provided us, which enabled me to have this transplant. I have now passed my six-month mark post-transplant. The doctors are thrilled with my progress and feel very good about everything thus far. The transplant team wants to see me for regular appointments up until two years after my transplant. Johns Hopkins is an extraordinary institution with a team of wonderful doctors and nurses who have saved my life and given me more hope that I have ever had. I am so proud of the community that I am part of. Your love, caring and tremendous support will never be forgotten by my family and me. I am looking forward to returning to school in September and to finally feel like a normal student again. On behalf of my family and me, we truly thank you for helping me get to this point in my recovery. May God bless you all.

Non-Jewish Africans in Israel (1)

LET THEM GO...

Ron Arad, Zachary Baumel, Zvi Feldman, Guy Hever, Yehuda Katz

While the extremist comments and violence directed against non-Jewish Africans who have found temporary asylum in Israel have no justification, the background to the protests must be told ("Stand up for asylum seekers in Israel," Jan. 31). In December 2012, an Eritrean man was accused of raping an 83-year-old woman in south Tel Aviv. That was in the minds of protesting Israelis living in this neighbourhood, after a history of other acts of violence attributed to the refugees. Residents of south Tel Aviv are gripped by fear in their own neighbourhoods. The guest voice accuses "radical government officials" of incitement against the refugees. The "incitement" does not come from government officials. It is grassroots, and it is not racist.

Errors of fact abound in this article. The guest voice states, "Most asylum seekers... are not permitted to work, to access health services, or even to apply for refugee status." Israel, under its Border Crossings Authority, has granted "temporary protection group" status, assistance and work permits to asylum seekers, and health care is never refused in Israel. On Jan. 13, 2011, Israel's Supreme Court decided that fines would not be imposed on employers of asylum seekers. In effect, officially, illegal workers can work.

But, the country's ability to sustain non-Jewish refugees is limited. Uncapped absorption of non-Jewish asylum seekers, approximately half of whom are Muslim, is an impossibility for the demographically challenged Jewish state. The State of Israel was not created to save the world's refugees. What it has done so far for the refugees from Sudan and Eritrea is more than commendable. Their return to their African homelands must be facilitated soon.

Non-Jewish Africans in Israel (2)

The view expressed in the guest voice "Stand up for asylum seekers in Israel" (Jan. 31), is misguided compassion that is not true to Judaism. Similarly, the Israeli liberal newspaper Ha'aretz has continuously, in its editorials and opinion pieces, condemned Israel's policy towards Eritrean and Sudanese migrants, while being silent about the racism and hardships encountered by our Ethiopian Jewish brethren. Israel, a tiny country, cannot accommodate all migrants fleeing there. Why are "tolerant" bigger countries, such as Greece, Hungary and Saudi Arabia, not welcoming their Christian and Muslim co-religionists? We should remember that no good deed goes unpunished for Jews. African countries after the Yom Kippur War broke off ties with Israel despite its huge aid to them.

Don't blame Israel

In reply to the letter "Israel agreed to return captured lands," (Jan. 31), blaming Israel for the lack of security, I have only two words: "Fogel family." (Five members of the family were slaughtered in their beds by terrorists in the West Bank.)

'God is pressuring me not to give up'

Rabbi David Hartman, president emeritus of the Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem, died Feb. 10. He was interviewed by Uri Misgav in Yedioth Ahronoth on Dec. 2, 2011. The article below is an abridged and adapted version of the translation of the interview that appeared on Ynetnews. The CJN reproduced it from the Shalom Hartman Institute website.

Rabbi Hartman: The leaders of Religious Zionism have lost all sense of purpose. Everything has become a war – a war with stones, a war to preserve power. Religion today is controlled by people who do not understand what Jewish revival is, what revolution is, and what we wanted to have here.

Misgav: What did they want?

The revolution was meant to create a new humanity, a humanity that lives in reality and takes responsibility for that reality, working within that reality, not in a fantasy world. Not a world in which passages from the Bible are constantly quoted and fought over – that's nonsense.

This isn't what you dreamed of.

I moved here in 1971 out of a belief that we were creating a new history, a new Jew. So, yes, we have a state, but there is something missing. We are missing people to instil a spiritual vision. The leadership lost the connection to revolution, to awakening, to ethical possibilities. It's killing me.

What is happening to religious Zionism, the stream that is meant to blend Judaism, the Land and State of Israel? How has the moderate voice within religious Zionism become so small and withered?

In America, I received a doctorate in philosophy. I taught general philosophy and Jewish philosophy. I wrote a book about Maimonides, whose greatness was in the way that the Jewish-particularistic and the universalistic coexisted within him. He lived with both of them, and it was impossible to know when he would choose to emphasize one or the other.

Why did that happen?

Religious Zionism is dead. It had a vision, but its leaders were afraid of losing their sense of belonging to Judaism. They thought that if they brought rabbis, everything would be OK. But it wasn't. The haredim? They are being fruitful and multiplying. I have relatives who have 12 or 18 children. I'm happy for them, because I love Jewish life, but I'm not happy about their moral lives.

The 'hardal' world (religious Zionist haredi) is becoming haredi. They think that a religious outlook requires detachment from the world of western culture. They love Israel, they serve in the army, but it doesn't change their minds.

We thought that paratrooper rabbis were the essence of modernism, but jumping from a plane does not symbolize spiritual maturity. It takes time and openness to develop a worldview and free thought. It requires a willingness to listen to different music – something they don't have. OK, so they go to elite army units. It doesn't make them modern people.

Can you comment on haredi soldiers who abandoned a ceremony in which female soldiers were singing on stage?

It's insane, insane. These people emphasize marginal issues. The important thing is loving-kindness. I served as an adviser to Zevulun Hammer, when he was minister of welfare in the first [Yitzhak] Rabin government. There was a debate about F-15s landing on Shabbat. I said, 'Planes are not obligated to keep Shabbat, pilots are. Why are you worrying about the plane and not trying to educate and open the heart of the pilot?' But they lost all contact with the pilot.

A file photo from the mid-90's of Rabbi David Hartman addressing an audience in a typically defiant manner

Except my son-in-law, Aharal'eh Katz, who was killed in Lebanon. He was a spiritual giant. He received a Medal of Honor in the Yom Kippur War. He was the first navigator who was slated to be a pilot commander. He was an ethical man, who woke up early in the morning to pray so as not to impose on anyone else. He flew on Shabbat in place of others. He flew on Yom Kippur in place of others.

It's a different world. You don't see that anymore. They emphasize trivial things. We lost the deeper meaning.

From a halachic perspective, is there a problem with women standing up to sing?

No. The Gemara talks only about a loss of concentration while reciting the Shema. If women are singing when you are in the middle of reciting the Shema, it will hinder your intent. That's it. No more.

There used to be normal rabbis. Listen to this. You should say Shehechiyanu over the fact that there are still rabbis like this. The daughter of this rabbi loves to sing. When his friends came to visit, someone asked him to tell her to stop singing. He replied that according to Halachah, she's allowed to sing, the man is not allowed to listen. He suggested that the guest leave.

Or this. One day, a group of believers came to a rabbi and asked him what they should be focusing on while fulfilling the commandment to burn chametz. He said, 'You should make sure that your wife, who is dragging the sacks of flour, isn't working too hard.' Where has all that gone? What has happened to us?

Why hasn't there been a strong rabbinical outcry against "price tag" (violence perpetrated by youth against Jews and Arabs) activities?

Because the leadership is twisted. Corrupt to the core.

They don't educate toward the sanctity of life. They talk in slogans. They don't say, 'Man is good, for he was created in the image of God.' You can see this in the attitude toward Arabs and you can see it in the attitude toward women. In my book, The God Who Hates Lies, there is an attack on the entire world of religious Zionism precisely because of these issues.

When my daughter [Tova] built the [Shira Hadasha] synagogue, people came to me and said, 'But she's a woman.' I said, 'You are willing to go to a female brain surgeon, to let a woman be responsible for your life or death, but when a woman walks into the synagogue, she becomes a little girl? It's ridiculous.'

Meanwhile, in Jerusalem, women have been removed from billboards.

That's insulting to me. I'm embarrassed. This is what has become of the Zionist dream? When I came to Israel for the first time after the Six Day War, Prof. Akiva Simon insisted that I go to a Hashomer Hatzair kibbutz. So I went. I saw that they were building a road in the middle of the kibbutz and asked him why. He explained that they were building a road so that a member of the kibbutz who was paralyzed and lived at the edge of the kibbutz could get to the dining room.

Afterward, people asked me what my most religious experience was in Israel. They thought that I would say, reading Mishnah at the Western Wall. But I said that it was at the Hashomer Hatzair kibbutz, where I saw them building a road for one person. That's a holy place. The entire community makes sure that the individual does not lose his place.

That's what I thought I would see in Israel – a living Judaism that was gentle, sensitive, moral, loving. From the moment that I moved here, I fought for it to be that way. That's why I built the institute, as a place open to religious and secular, Jews and Arabs.

Is anyone even listening to you?

I have not lost hope. I wake up in the morning, and God says to me, 'David, put on your tfillin, and go to work. Don't give up.'

You talk to God?

I search for God. I hope that he sees my work as important.

He talks to you?

Yes. God is pressuring me not to give up, to believe that I can contribute, not to stop believing that things can change, to get out of the war. It's an existential war for me. What is happening today with religion is more dangerous than what's happening with the Arabs. The Arabs want to kill my body – the Jews are killing my soul...

To be religious today is an ongoing war not to let the haredim and the hardalim own the Torah. I want to return the Torah to the... entire people of Israel. I don't want religion to be the private property of certain people. I don't want the length of the sidelocks to be the determining factor.

What do you think about the hesder yeshivot?

Their problem is that they went only half way: they understood that it was important to find a way for yeshiva boys to be drafted into the army without compromising their ability to keep learning, but that's only the beginning.

The question is what content is given to them? Is national zealousness everything? The very extreme rabbis are dangerous in my opinion. I understand the need to belong to the land, but that doesn't make you a Jew. What makes you a Jew is how you behave on that land.

So your life work was in a sense a failure?

A lot of young people come to me and say, 'If not for you, I wouldn't be religious.' So I did not fail. I don't believe that life here is for naught. Even though it drains my energy and I am weak – this is the place. If we can't make it here, we can't make it anywhere. I tried to create a different kind of spiritual ideal. Not a shtibl, not a shtetl – a people. It can be done.

The closed nature of the Orthodox world is unacceptable to me. To understand rabbis' weaknesses, the Orthodox world has to be part of the public discourse.

People read my books. It makes me happy. There is a minority that we can build upon, but I don't know if it's strong enough. One thing is for sure: it's hard work. And they try to embarrass me. They try to say that Hartman is not really religious. They malign me. It doesn't bother me. I am threatening to them – very threatening. I can't be loved by all.

There is a lot of work, but you can believe in possibilities. I thought that Israel would expand my soul. I am going to keep working until my last day.

What my first picketers taught me about learning

Gil Troy

McGill University has been my academic home for two decades. I have taught thousands of students, always encouraging them to ask, challenge, learn and think independently. I frequently echo a friend of mine who would grandly welcome me into his home saying, "He who is shy does not eat" by saying, "He – or she – who is shy does not learn." I love the classroom's openness, the luxury we students and professors have to explore intellectually together. I relish every class I have taught as a learning journey, trying to break down the artificial barriers we all erect that stop us from thinking, stretching and growing.

Given that love of the learning process, I was surprised last month when I appeared at the McGill bookstore for a lunchtime lecture to launch my new book. For the first time in my McGill career – despite having taken controversial positions over those years – I was picketed. My crime, of course, was being a Zionist and writing a book about Zionism –Moynihan's Moment: America's Fight Against Zionism as Racism. As I and others who came to the lecture ascended the third-floor staircase, two or three protesters presented us with an anti-Zionist handout, emphasizing that they were Jewish and anti-Zionist.

Most people attending the lecture ignored the protesters, who hold weekly anti-Zionist vigils. It's important to emphasize that there were 15 to 20 times more attendees than protesters. One student, Yonah Diamond, who was a Shalom Hartman Institute summer intern with me last summer, spoke to the protesters, respectfully. A Jewish studies and political science major from Toronto, Diamond challenged an "End Zionism" sign they had brandished a week earlier. He asked: "Don't you see the hypocrisy in advocating on behalf of one people's rights [the Palestinians'] while simultaneously denying that self-determination to another people?"

Diamond quickly realized "they were completely OK with this hypocrisy, because they simply accepted stereotypical accusations, which they claimed to be historically accurate," taking refuge in the usual anti-Zionist buzzwords: "colonialist, ethnic cleansing, racist, apartheid." Their discussion about a two-state solution was particularly appalling. "They thought the idea of partition or two states was racist," he reports, which suggested to him that "they're not living in reality… they truly believe the lies and stereotypes."

During the question period following my lecture, one protester, wearing anti-Zionist slogans on his ski jacket, took something I said out of context to accuse me of being "racist." He lacked the discipline or the integrity to ask a question. He had not come to learn, only to posture. Although I had told the bookstore officials I did not object to the students leafleting inside the warm store rather than outside in the frigid cold – because I believe in academic freedom – his approach, which reflected no interest in learning, offended me – and I told him so. He walked away angrily.

Another protester asked a reasonable question. After comparing Israel to apartheid-era South Africa – a premise I refuted by noting the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is a national not racial conflict – he asked what criticisms I had of Israel. This question gave me an opportunity to celebrate Israeli democracy, and demonstrate that I, like others, have many concerns regarding the peace process, the growing gap between rich and poor and the role of the ultra-Orthodox. But, I pointed out, whatever criticisms I have, I don't reject the state. I don't demonize a country because, like all countries, it's imperfect.

In truth, the other questions I fielded were better, fuller, richer, more illuminating about my talk – and more to the point. They were asked by people who came to learn, not to score points, and they pushed me to refine some ideas while inviting me to emphasize others.

Diamond believes, that, ironically, the protesters, "proved the importance of [my] message. The way they unthinkingly accused Israel of all these modern evils emptied these terms of any meaning. This ignorance filled the halls of the UN General Assembly in 1975 and continues to poison the minds of my fellow students. [Former American UN ambassador] Daniel Patrick Moynihan taught us that words and ideas have far-reaching consequences, and this couldn't have become clearer to me that day."

Students such as Yonah – some of whom, like him, become friends – make teaching at McGill a privilege. Not because he agrees with me, but because he comes to learn, and therefore does.

'Lite' green synagogues

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

in Toronto

We've just marked Tu b'Shvat, the New Year of the trees. Noted in the Talmud as the "new year" of the trees for tithing, it was taken on later by the mystics as a spiritual celebration of the four seasons and the seven species of the Land of Israel.

But it was in the early 1970s that it really took hold in the larger Jewish community and became a kind of Jewish Earth Day. Tu b'Shvat is when synagogues and Jewish organizations all seem to become "green for a day." We talk about Jewish environmentalism, invite a special speaker from some hip ecological organization, read creative poetry about our relationship with the earth, and put out articles on climate change for folks to read (on paper, which will then be thrown away or, hopefully, recycled – if the congregation has a blue bin). But what happens the Shabbat after? Like "Sisterhood Shabbat" when we become feminist, or "youth Shabbat" when we bring out the teenagers who don't come the rest of the year, we isolate the environment as an interesting issue like any other special program. The environment in February, women in March, teens in April – let's see, what can we focus on in May.

But environmentalism isn't a "theme" for a service. It's the most pressing issue of our day, of humanity and of our planet. It's not about whether Judaism will survive. It's about whether the human species will survive. We all want to bequeath Judaism to our grandchildren. But if the generations after our grandchildren have been pushed to the brink of destruction by drought, fire, rising tides, unbreathable air and polluted water, what will we say to them? "Where were you, grandpa? Didn't you know this was happening?" If our Judaism can't speak to this issue, and if it's saved for only one evening on the 15th of Shvat, we are in physical peril as much as we are in spiritual peril.

Rabbi Larry Troster – with whom I was privileged to work while he was assistant rabbi at Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto and I was at Holy Blossom Temple many years ago – wrote a blog post entitled "From Light Green To Dark Green: Committing to An Effective Jewish Environmentalism," in which he notes that "much of Jewish environmentalism is based on an underlying philosophy of what has been called 'Light Green' environmentalism. This is an environmentalism that seeks to solve issues like sustainability and climate change through green consumerism, new technology and green job promotion. All of this is good, but it will not solve climate change, environmental injustice or species extinction. It ignores the role of population and development in the environmental crisis, and it ignores the serious critiques of the world economic system, which is a major component in creating climate change and environmental injustice. Light Green environmentalism is based on a stewardship ethic that still privileges human needs and refuses to incorporate a more biocentrist approach to environmental ethics. In other words, a 'Dark Green' environmentalism."

The stewardship model says we are in charge of the world, but we just have to take better care of it as its custodians. And so we continue to develop new technologies that harm the earth because we still need them for our businesses or our leisure time. We'll continue to build factories that pollute, but we'll monitor them better. We'll continue to breed cattle for meat and cut down forests for grazing land because we want our cheap, fast-food burgers – but we'll introduce salads on our menus in recyclable, clam-shell containers to do our part.

In contrast, a biocentrist approach posits that the earth has intrinsic value apart from what it can do or provide for us. We protect the rainforest not only because it may provide the plant that has the cure for cancer, but also because it has its own inherent value, simply as a rainforest. A biocentrist approach sees the needs of the planet as being equal to the needs of us humans. It goes way beyond buying a store's own brand of "green" detergent. It asks deep questions about that store's policies, that brand's politics and even why we need the detergent in the first place.

Tu b'Shvat has come and gone, the almond tree has blossomed, but underneath it, in many of our shuls and organizational halls, is still a pile of styrofoam plates and plastic cutlery.

Post-revolutionary Egypt torn by deep fissures

Egypt, long a beacon of stability in the Arab world, has been thrown into disarray since the downfall of its authoritarian president, Hosni Mubarak, two years ago this month.

Mubarak, a pro-western secular leader who presided over a dictatorial regime and preserved Egypt's peace treaty with Israel, was toppled during the Arab Spring, the internal rebellions that have boldly challenged the stultified political order in the Middle East. Mubarak, who held office for nearly three decades, resigned after 18 days of increasingly violent street protests, transferring his authority to the armed forces, which would imprison him and his two sons on charges of corruption and abuse of power.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

During this interim period, the Supreme Council of the Armed Forces, the body that inherited Mubarak's mantle, was headed by Field Marshal Mohamed Hussein Tantawi, the longtime defence minister. Tantawi, self-servingly, usurped yet more power while blandly professing to be in favour of democracy.

Last June, the candidate of the banned Muslim Brotherhood, Mohamed Morsi, an American-educated engineer, won post-revolutionary Egypt's first free presidential election with only 51 per cent of the popular vote. He defeated Ahmed Shafik, Mubarak's last prime minister, and a coterie of progressive and nationalist candidates who had initiated the revolution. In effect, the Muslim Brotherhood hijacked the 2011 revolution.

Morsi, who had vowed to be "a president for all Egyptians," was swiftly undermined by the army, the strongest institution in Egypt since the 1952 revolution. Tantawi and his fellow generals staged a soft coup, dissolving parliament – controlled by the Muslim Brotherhood – placing strict limits on Morsi's powers, seizing control of the process of drafting a new constitution and re-establishing martial law, which Mubarak had imposed after the assassination of his predecessor, Anwar Sadat, in 1981.

With these draconian measures, Tantawi threw Egypt back into the muck of authoritarianism, making a mockery of the democratic rhetoric that had defined the 2011 revolution.

But in an astonishing counter-coup last August, Morsi struck back, using an incident in the Sinai Peninsula, in which 16 Egyptian soldiers were killed by a band of Islamic fundamentalists, to reassert his authority.

Morsi forced Tantawi into retirement, dismissed army chief of staff Sami Hafez Anan, regarded as Tantawi's successor, sacked a number of other generals and fired the governor of northern Sinai as well as the chief of military intelligence. He also appointed a new defence minister, Abdul Fattah el-Sisi.

Egyptian Defence Minister Abdul Fattah el-Sisi

Pundits generally agree that Morsi's moves were inspired by Turkey's campaign of recent years to reduce the outsize influence of the armed forces.

Having assertively propped up his Islamist regime, Morsi may have assumed he had carte blanche to do whatever he pleased.

He was dead wrong.

Last November, under the pretext of speeding up Egypt's bumpy and convoluted transition from autocracy to democracy, he issued a sweeping decree granting himself immunity from judicial oversight.

The measure touched off a wave of unrest.

Claiming the decree was required to ratify a new constitution and block a conspiracy by pro-Mubarak forces to unseat the president, Mori's spokesman said he would relinquish these powers within a few months.

The explanation did not wash in secular and liberal circles, raising widespread fears that he sought to become Egypt's new strongman by stealth.

More political violence erupted in December following Morsi's announcement that a referendum would be held to approve a new constitution.

Morsi claimed it would enshrine human rights. Critics, particularly those in the Coptic Christian community, which forms about 10 per cent of Egypt's population, complained that the proposed constitution would pay far too much deference to Islamic law, offer little protection to minorities and women and, worst of all, lay the foundation for a retrogressive Islamic state.

Morsi won the referendum by a comfortable two-thirds margin, and the new constitution took immediate effect. But Mori's opponents, led by Mohamed El Baradei – a presidential candidate and the former director of the International Atomic Energy Agency – described the constitution as a "very polarizing" document that denies Egyptians freedom of religion and expression and suppresses the independence of the judiciary.

Despite Morsi's unilateralism, observers wonder whether he and his allies can, in fact, implement their programs and policies. The bureaucracy, largely composed of secularists appointed during the Mubarak era, may well put up fierce resistance to his vision of a new Islamic Egypt.

In the meantime, tensions continue to fester. Throughout January, as lawlessness engulfed the country and open rebellion broke out in three cities along the Suez Canal, Morsi called out the army to deal with demonstrators. In the ensuing clashes, more than 50 Egyptians were killed, reminding observers of the pre-2011 days when dissent was barely tolerated. Of late, protestors have demonstrated in front of Morsi's presidential palace in Cairo.

Such has been the turmoil that the defence minister recently issued a stark warning that political differences "on running the affairs of the country may lead to the collapse of the state and threatens the future of the coming generations."

With critics already charging that Morsi has not lived up to his pledge to represent all Egyptians, the situation is likely to grow still worse when he imposes austerity measures to cope with an economy in a tailspin.

Tourism, one of the principal sources of foreign currency, has fallen by one-third. The unemployment rate among Egyptians between the ages of 25 to 29 has risen to a catastrophic 25 per cent. Calling this figure "a socio-economic time bomb," a former Egyptian finance minister recently observed it is especially worrisome because the popular uprising that deposed Mubarak and paved the way for Morsi was spearheaded by Egyptians in this age range.

Beyond the daunting problem of youth unemployment, which has been exacerbated by a decline in foreign investment, Morsi faces another challenge that speaks directly to Egypt's current economic woes.

Egypt has requested a loan of $4.8 billion from the International Monetary Fund, but will not get it unless food and fuel subsidies to the poor, the core of Morsi's constituency, are reduced. But with half of all Egyptians living on less than $2 per day, Morsi will be hard-pressed to comply with the IMF demand.

Morsi thus finds himself between a rock and a hard place as he attempts to govern an ancient nation torn by deep political, social and economic fissures and manifestly uncertain of its future.

THERE'S NOTHING EXCITING ABOUT IT. UNLESS YOU'RE EXCITED BY MAKING MONEY.

Beth Radom rabbi is on sabbatical

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Beth Radom Congregation has announced that Rabbi Steven Schonblum, spiritual leader of the congregation since 2001, is on sabbatical as of Feb. 8. The sabbatical will last until the end of July, when his contract ends.

The unaffiliated Conservative egalitarian synagogue, which has 350 families, is in a period of transition following a board decision in October 2012 not to renew the rabbi's contract, and a subsequent unsuccessful challenge by a group of members seeking to replace the board and overturn its decision.

Among other issues cited, the board alleged that the rabbi had performed "unauthorized" conversions.

A group of five members who sought to replace the board challenged the allegations in a letter to congregants, claiming the rabbi had complied with requests to make changes and had in fact acted in accordance with authorization from the board.

The group also blamed the board for what they termed a "financial crisis" at the shul.

Jordan Cait, a shul vice-president, told The CJN in December the financial issues were due to "a seasonal cash-flow problem."

Some congregants had withheld their dues because of the controversy.

In a Feb. 7 good-bye letter to congregants on the shul's website, Rabbi Schonblum asked that members who had not yet paid their 2013 dues call the synagogue office "forthwith" to make payment.

He wrote that he had come to "an amicable arrangement" with the board.

> The shul must continue to survive and meet the needs of all its congregants

"Although the past number of months have been a difficult time for all of us, it is now time both for me, my family and the [congregation] to move on," he wrote.

"A healing process needs to commence for the benefit of us all, and the shul must continue to survive and meet the needs of all its congregants," the rabbi added. "To survive and be in a position to meet all its financial obligations, including its obligations to its employees, including myself, the synagogue relies primarily on the payment of dues from its congregants."

Beth Radom president Henry Icyk wrote in his own letter on the website that the past few months have been "a time of re-assessing and learning... What we have learned is the importance of keeping you all updated and in the loop about the goings on here at shul, and that is why I am writing to you today."

In the letter, Icyk assured members that Cantor David Rosen and "many" lay leaders have committed to ensuring that "all services, events and simchahs will continue at the shul uninterrupted."

A transition task force was formed at the shul in December and will unveil its plan at a town hall meeting Mar. 6, Icyk wrote.

Cait told The CJN that the past few months have been "a difficult time.

"We believe it's best for both Rabbi Schonblum and the congregation, for him to be on sabbatical... This is going to help facilitate healing."

Cait said that only a small number of people – "literally, a handful" – have left the synagogue, but that most of the board members who were part of the "petitioning" group have resigned from the board.

He said it would be premature to comment on how effective the rabbi's request for dues payment has been, but that "the situation has been improving."

Part of the purpose of the upcoming meeting is to get "lots of input" from members. "That's part of the healing process," Cait said.

He said that there will definitely be a rabbi on the pulpit for the High Holidays. "We're moving forward with Cantor Rosen, who will be our main clergy person for the next little while."

Elliot Berlin, a supporter of Rabbi Schonblum and a regular at Beth Radom, said he has lost faith in the board and that he would have to make a decision together with his family about whether to wait and see how things proceed or resign as a shul member.

One of an estimated 30 people who followed Rabbi Schonblum to Beth Radom from his previous position as ritual director of Pride of Israel Synagogue, Berlin said, "A declaration that there's going to be a healing process does not do it."

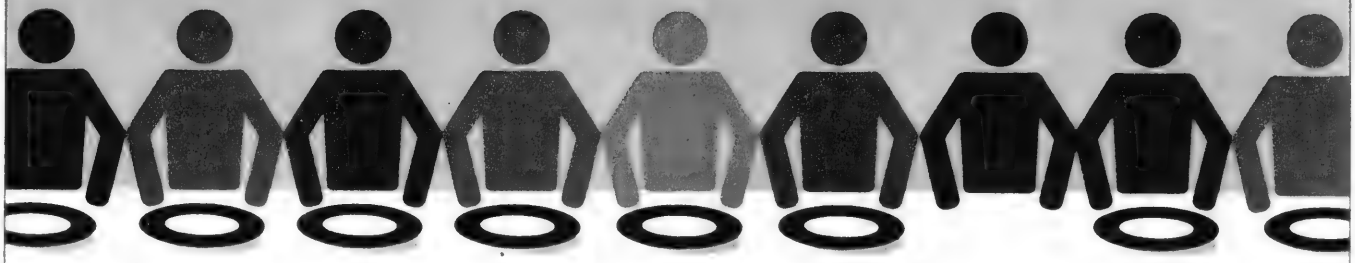
THE GLOBAL SEDER TO FIGHT HUNGER

United Jewish Appeal



Can you imagine
a Jewish holiday without food?

Probably not. But that's the reality facing thousands of Jews in Toronto, Israel, Cuba and the Former Soviet Union who can't afford the basic staples for Passover.

But it doesn't have to be this way.

Please give to United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto's Global Seder to Fight Hunger, to help Jews in need celebrate Passover in dignity.

Young professionals network for a cure

The Israel Cancer Research Fund's (ICRF) Next Generation Division raised $75,000 Feb. 7 to establish two grants for Israeli scientists to do a year of cancer research.

At the third annual Revolving Tables –networking for a cure event at the Bram & Bluma Appel Salon of the Toronto Reference Library, some of the country's leading CEOs, executives and business leaders shared their advice and personal stories with more than 250 of Toronto's young professionals.

The event was held to raise awareness and funds for ICRF. From the pre-dinner cocktail hour on, guests could seek out any of the 32 notable professionals in fields including law, entertainment, consulting, real estate, sports, media and writing, participate in a silent auction, and purchase raffle tickets for prizes such as time with top CEOs.

Revolving Tables participants were asked to list their preferred areas of interest prior to the evening so that they could be placed at dinner tables with moderators they wanted to know more about. Enjoying a three-course dinner with mentors including, among others, Paul Beeston, president of the Toronto Blue Jays; Michael Bryant, politician and former attorney general of Ontario; Paul Godfrey, president and CEO of Postmedia Inc.; Michele Maheux, executive director and COO of the Toronto International Film Festival; Dr. Marla Shapiro, author and medical expert on CTV; John Tory, activist, former leader of the Progressive Conservative party of Ontario and current radio host.

After each course, all participants moved to new tables to sit with a different mentor and get the opportunity to form new relationships and receive career advice.

Event co-chairs were Leah Carr and Kyle Lichtman, both Toronto young professionals. Revolving Tables is based on the idea that engagement by younger individuals now will result in greater awareness and interest in giving back later.

"ICRF is truly a cause worth rallying behind," Lichtman said. "The special ingredient in Revolving Tables' success is that it provides participants with something they truly value – face-to-face interaction and career tips from renowned executives."

Carr added that the evening is popular because it offers "great food, professional growth and social exchange."

Corey Mandell, CEO of Mandell Entertainment Group, also spoke of the evening's benefits for the participants. "Having been a mentor at Revolving Tables for the past two years, and now having the opportunity to host this year, I can truly say this is a unique event that is so beneficial to our young professional community. I have produced thousands of events over my 22 years in the business and never have I seen an event that gives so much back while raising awareness and money for such an important cause," he said.

ICRF was founded in 1975 by a group of American and Canadian medical researchers, oncologists and others committed to the growth and development of Israel and the fight against cancer. Since its inception, ICRF has provided more than 1,900 grants and $45 million to support innovative studies by Israeli scientists.

"Israel has one of the most sophisticated nation-wide electronic medical records in the world," said Dr. Fei-Fei Liu, clinician-scientist radiation oncologist at Princess Margaret Hospital in Toronto and a senior scientist at the Ontario Cancer Institute. "[Israel] has more than its share of Nobel laureates, and its ability to commercialize discoveries is next to none. Supporting cancer research in Israel is inspiring, because discoveries made in Israel will ultimately benefit everyone in the world."

Participants and mentors see the advantages of the Revolving Tables evening. "For a young professional, networking is such an important skill to practice," said participant Susanna Dawson, senior manager for corporate initiatives at EF Educational Tours. "I really enjoyed hearing about... the mentors' passions that have continued to inspire them throughout their careers."

Asked where passion fits into the business equation, Brent Belzberg, founder and senior managing partner of Torquest Partners, said, "If you love what you do, no matter what it is, and you strive to be the best at it, you will succeed. Wealth is merely a measurement of success. It is not an end in itself."

Fla. police seek info on woman in murder case

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Police in Hallandale Beach, Fla., are trying to identify a woman captured on video outside the townhouse of Donny Pichosky and Rochelle Wise the day the Toronto couple were murdered.

The Jan. 9 video, which was taken by a neighbour's surveillance system, shows a woman carrying an item and walking to the rear of the house just before 11 a.m., then walking back to the front/side area of the house empty-handed.

Police say the woman in the video is not a suspect or a person of interest. She is heavy-set and in the video is wearing a dark jacket, grey pants and white running shoes, and she appears to be blond and either eating or smoking as she walks.

The footage can be found on cjnews.com

Pichosky, 71, and Wise, 66, were found Jan. 10 by a concerned neighbour who had a key to their Venetian Park townhouse. They had failed to show up for a planned lunch and didn't answer repeated phone calls.

Wise was a preschool administrator at Bialik Hebrew Day School and a founding director of Crestwood Valley Day Camp.

Pichosky, her husband of four years, was a retired businessman who volunteered with seniors at Baycrest, and had spent at least 20 years wintering in Florida.

Hallandale police have been tight-lipped about the case and have not released a cause of death. Hallandale Beach police chief Dwayne Flournoy told the South Florida Sun-Sentinel last month that police believe providing details would "severely hamper" their ability to solve the case.

As part of the investigation, Hallandale police, including Flournoy, travelled to Toronto at the end of January to meet with family members and others who knew the couple. Flournoy has expressed confidence that the murders will be solved, and he assured residents of the condo complex at a Jan. 22 meeting that they are not at increased risk.

Police are asking anyone with information about the identity of the person on the video to call Det. Lane Sauls at 954-457-1438. If you wish to remain anonymous, contact Crime Stoppers at 954-493-TIPS or via email at www.browardcrimestoppers.org to receive up to a $1,000 reward.

Both volunteers and telemarketers raise funds for UJA

Contrary to what some people may think, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto doesn't rely exclusively on volunteers to solicit donations by phone.

"We've been using telemarketers for years and years to augment the volunteer efforts and professional staff efforts to raise funds," Steven Shulman, UJA's campaign director and counsel, told The CJN.

Almost 700 volunteers canvass on behalf of UJA in Toronto, and "well over 1,000" take part in volunteer telethons like the annual Super Sunday, Shulman said.

"I would say we use telethons more than not only any other federation in North America, but more than almost any other philanthropic organization."

However, he noted, telethons have their limits. "Even when you use volunteers, telethons cost money in terms of food, staff time, and in terms of promoting the telethon."

From a financial standpoint, sometimes using telemarketers can be more cost effective, he said. For one thing, he said, they can process calls more quickly because of the technology they use.

Telethons such as Super Sunday, held during the High Holiday period, are "very efficient" because people are ready for the call, and "you have a very motivated volunteer base.

"You can't have the same volunteer base out week after week, month after month."

The federation monitors the cost of using telemarketers, to ensure that the ratio of cost to donations is "something we're comfortable with," Shulman said.

For at least the past year, the federation has been using a Canadian company with offices across the country. The callers are in Canada, but Shulman could not say in which city or cities.

In the past, it has used companies in Israel and in the United States.

Although he has been campaign director for only five years, Shulman said that, even in that short time, it has become more difficult to "get people to [answer] the phone, for anything... That's a challenge."

But "phone efforts are still very important to us," he added. "We bring in over $4 million a year through our phone campaign. The bulk of that is through telethons, augmented by outside contractors."

Also, he said, "what we bring in through the telephone represents between 30 and 40 per cent of the donors, in terms of number of donors. The vast majority of that is through the volunteer telethons."

The key point, Shulman believes, is that, "if we don't reach members of our community, they're not going to have a chance to engage in this collective effort to strengthen the Jewish People through a gift to UJA." —F.K.

Consumers urged to buy SodaStream at The Bay

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

In the aftermath of a recent demonstration by anti-Israel protesters in front of Winnipeg's downtown Hudson's Bay Company (The Bay) store, Canadians are being urged to buy Israeli-made SodaStream products from the retail giant.

On Feb. 10, some 20 boycott, divestment and sanctions activists from an organization calling itself the Winnipeg Coalition Against Israeli Apartheid gathered in front of The Bay asking consumers not to buy products from the Israeli company, which produces its home carbonation machines in a West Bank factory. The protesters claim the company supports occupation of the Palestinian people.

Buycott Israel, an initiative of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), was started in 2009 to encourage consumers to support Israeli-made products in response to boycott actions.

It put out an alert to pro-Israel Canadians last week in response to the Winnipeg event.

"Buycotters – go stock up on your SodaStream and its associated products! Not in the Winnipeg area? Buy SodaStream at your local Bay and thank them for having this great, innovative product in stock," Buycott Israel said on its website last week.

Protesters advocating against Israeli products made in the occupied territories have targeted The Bay in the past. In 2011 the Ahava cosmetics line was singled out for boycott.

The Bay has consistently refused to be drawn into the politics involved in these campaigns, stating it carries an assortment of products based strictly on business principles and what customers want.

The SodaStream equipment

Sara Saber-Freedman, CIJA's executive vice-president based in Montreal, told The CJN last year that the "buycott" initiative has worked "pretty much every time" it has been employed.

In 2009, hundreds of pro-Israel consumers converged on a mid-town Toronto LCBO outlet to counter a call to boycott Israeli wines. Within a few hours, the store had sold out of its stock of about 150 cases of Israeli wine.

In 2011, Saber-Freedman and Buycott Israel helped dispel rumours that The Bay had removed Ahava beauty products from its shelves as part of a boycott request from Canadian anti-Israel group Canadians for Justice and Peace in the Middle East (CJPME).

The Bay had in fact temporarily removed the products from its stores in order to make room for a rebranded Ahava line that it continues to sell.

Last year, the pro-Israel campaign urged Canadians to shop at housewares retailer Bed, Bath & Beyond in response to a call to boycott Israeli-made Ahava cosmetics and SodaStream home carbonation products being sold at the U.S.-based chain.

Arab democracy could take centuries, or never happen

In light of the turmoil currently facing the Middle East, it would be an understatement to say that the media have had a difficult time making sense of the prospects for "Arab Spring" democracy.

Writing from Tunis about the assassination earlier this month of Chokri Belaid, the leader of the secular opposition, the Globe and Mail's Eric Reguly reflected on dire situation in Tunisia: "[T]he political chaos threatens to tarnish, perhaps even destroy, [the country's] reputation as the model in the Arab world for transition from dictatorship to modern democracy."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Non-democratic regional movements, specifically those characterized by tribalism (Libya) and Islamic authoritarianism (Egypt), appear to be gaining at the expense of prospects for liberal freedoms.

It was never clear from the start of the Arab Spring that the liberal freedoms we identify with democracy in the West – including individual rights and respect for minority rights – were the aspirations shared by the majority of those seeking freedom from tyranny in the Middle East. Indeed, most (if not all) of the societies in question remain patriarchal and religiously conservative.

Still, numerous experts continue to argue that the Arab Spring remains the harbinger of "real" democracy (that is, beyond the mere mechanics of elections). Those same analysts caution that, like other historical struggles for freedom, this will take time and involve setbacks.

In the Feb. 13 Times of Israel, Elhanan Miller interviewed Yigal Carmon, founder and president of the Middle East Media and Research Institute (MEMRI), which monitors and translates the Arab and Muslim media in the region. Miller points out that Carmon, who has studied the Middle East for decades, considers it racist to claim that Arabs cannot build democratic societies.

The challenge, however, is that the move to such a political order could take a very long time – measured in centuries. As Carmon notes: "There are no shortcuts in history. Europe took hundreds of years to agree on a progressive set of values."

According to Miller, "Carmon scoffs at the notion that a monolithic Islam has taken root in the Arab world… Far from an amorphous 'Islam' taking power, states are rapidly disintegrating into smaller structures representing region, tribe, religion and ethnic group."

Yigal Carmon

Coincidentally, Tom Friedman, in the New York Times (Feb. 10), drew attention to similar points about time frames and these smaller structures. Writing from New Delhi, but looking at the broader region, Friedman wrote: "Indian officials tend to think in centuries, not months, and they look at the map of the Middle East without any of the British-drawn colonial borders [following World War I]...

"'If you want to understand this region, just take out a map from the Ganges to the Nile and remove the British lines,' remarked M. J. Akbar, the veteran Indian Muslim journalist and author. It takes you back to the true undercurrents of history that have long ruled the Middle East 'and to interests defined by people and tribes and not just governments."

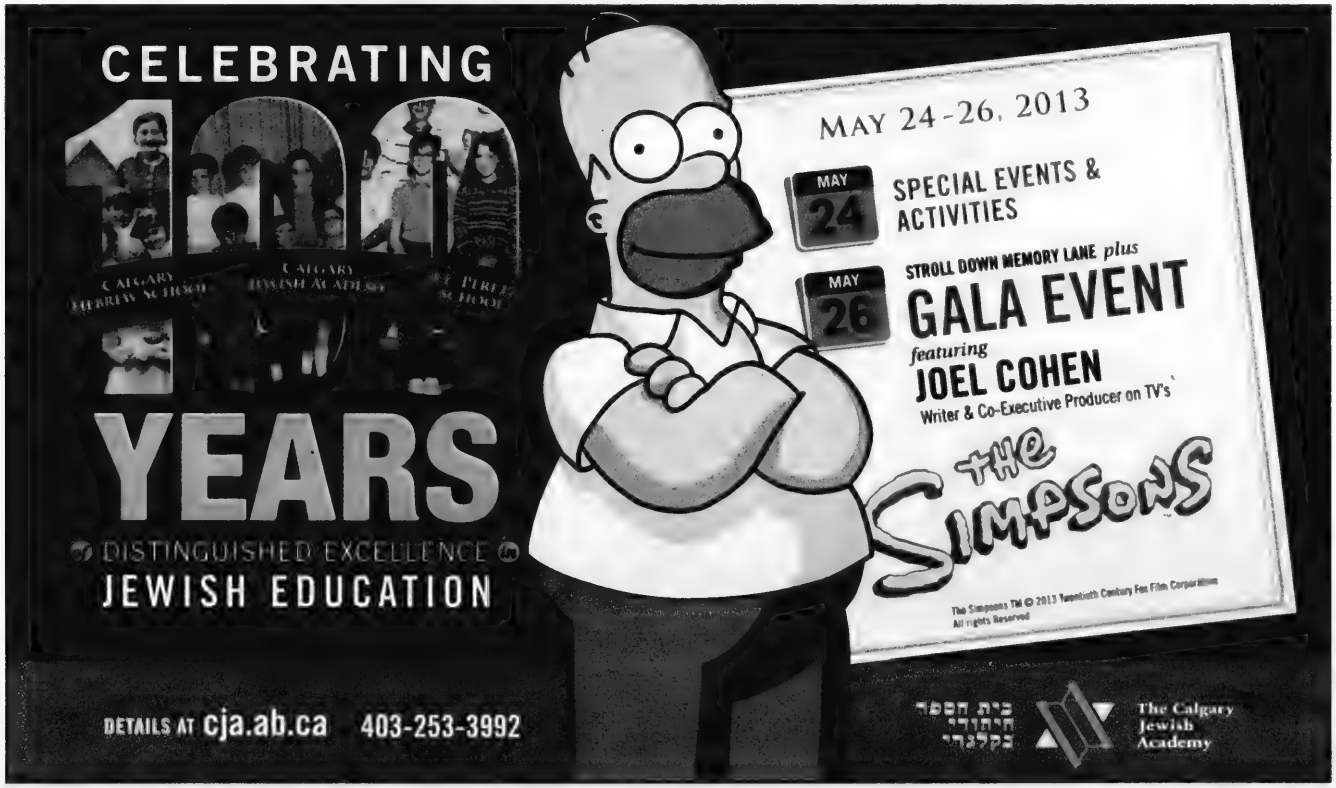
The references here to region, tribe and religion correspond with Carmon's thoughts. But, significantly, there is no indication that they hold the promise for any movement to democracy. Just the opposite appears to be the case, given the atavism, the return to an earlier order, to which Friedman alludes.

"So from India, the struggle in Syria looks like just another chapter in the long-running Sunni-Shiite civil war," which never ends but can only be "suppressed," he remarks.

Friedman foresees a Syria that breaks apart into Sunni and (Shiite-related) Alawite regions. He also reminds us that a similar process is already underway in Iraq, where "deep historical currents were at play there – Sunnis versus Shiites and Kurds versus Arabs."

We may not have adequate perspective to see what lies ahead for the Arab Spring. And we certainly don't have centuries to find out. What seems fair to say, however, is that early signs do not look promising.

Paul Michaels is director of research and senior media relations for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.



Liver transplant recipient urges others to donate

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Sam Marr found a hero – an anonymous donor who came forward to give him part of her or his liver.

"There was a time where my future didn't look so good," said the 51-year-old father of two. "Now it looks very good."

After most of a year on the transplant waiting list, in early November, he got the call that someone was a match, and he would go through a living-person liver transplant on Nov. 21.

Although he can't be sure how this donor found him, he said it was likely they heard his story from his wife, Susan, who wrote an email to friends and family pleading with them to check if their liver would be a match for Marr. The letter was forwarded on to a number of people, including The CJN.

Sam Marr

A living-person liver transplant involves a surgery that can take up to 10 hours in which a living person donates a portion of their liver. Often, several months after the transplant, the liver will regenerate to its original size. The portion inside the recipient also regenerates, though not quite to its original functioning capacity.

Already, just three months after the surgery, Marr said he feels much stronger and he hopes to return to his law office next month.

He said he wants people to know that he's on the road to recovery.

He especially wants to give his thanks to the people who supported him, whether they passed on his story online, in person or in synagogue, as well as to the people who treated him in Toronto General Hospital.

His experience has inspired him to get involved in organ donation awareness.

"There's not enough organ donation in our country," he said. In particular, he added, people need to know about live donations. "I think more people would do it if they knew about it."

He also hopes to call on the government to give a reward to the family of deceased organ donors. When you give a charitable donation, you get a tax receipt, he pointed out.

"One of the greatest donations a person could give when they're dead is to give their organs away," he said. "The estate and family should benefit from their generosity. I think it's the right thing to do."

Marr said he would remind anybody waiting for a transplant to have faith in the medical system. The surgery is difficult, but the doctors are tremendous. Additionally, he recommends finding a way to share their story to encourage people to be tested as a match.

People who are waiting for a match "have to figure out a way to try to spread the word," he said after a number of people came forward to be tested following his publicity campaign. "There's nothing special about me – I think other people would [then] have the same opportunities."

'The government is building a façade of democracy'

A Jan. 31 report in Spiegel Online seems to confirm Csillag's assertions that the boundaries between Fidesz and Jobbik's ideologies "are blurring."

Csillag, who acknowledged that his speaking out and raising an alarm might endanger him, pointed out that while Orban was in opposition, he began setting up grassroots, nationalistic groups to promote a pure Hungary.

Many of the "main personalities" of those groups have since become influential members of Jobbik, he said.

The reason Orban set up the civilian groups was to discredit the then-ruling Hungarian Socialist Party and those on the left by labeling them anti-Hungarian, according to Csillag.

Orban's friend and Fidesz co-founder, prominent Hungarian social commentator Zsolt Bayer, wrote in the daily Magyar Hirlap newspaper in January that Roma are "unfit for coexistence. They are not fit to live among people. These Roma are animals, and they behave like animals. These animals shouldn't be allowed to exist. In no way. That needs to be solved. They should be stamped out – immediately and regardless of the method."

Neither Orban nor any other Fidesz member denounced the article.

In the past, Bayer has also referred to Jews as "stinking excrement called something like Cohen," according to the World Jewish Congress.

Members of Fidesz have also publicly demonstrated support for Miklos Horthy, the World War II-era Hungarian prime minister who helped the Nazis murder tens of thousands of the country's Jews and Roma.

Last November, Jobbik member Marton Gyongyosi called for Jews to be registered on lists as threats to national security. Massive protests broke out in Budapest, prompting Gyongyosi to apologize and say his remarks were misinterpreted.

However, the parliamentarian was never disciplined for his comments.

Orban's office eventually denounced Gyongyosi's remarks, though it only did so 16 hours after the comments were uttered. Jewish groups in Hungary were critical of the delay.

Hungarian Holocaust survivor and executive director of the Hungarian Jewish Congregations' Association said the event and lack of action by Fidesz and Jobbik made Hungary "the shame of Europe."

Csillag said Fidesz has also slowly been curtailing freedom of the press and free speech, saying that most of the country's TV and radio stations are increasingly falling under the control of the government and provoking anger at anyone who dares speak out against it.

"My activities aren't big enough to be a threat to the government," he said, noting that he's usually out on the streets about three times a week to document "the decline in democracy" in Hungary.

"There's only one radio station that you could still consider to be 'free', and that's only because of international media scrutiny," Csillag said.

"The government is building a façade of democracy, behind that they are destroying basic rights. They are giving Hungarians the option to focus their economic fears through hate."

The net result, he said, is similar to what transpired in prewar Nazi Germany, where Roma and Jews were scapegoated for all of the country's problems.

Csillag said that while there are still "plenty of goodwilled people" in Hungary, power resides with Fidesz, which continues to foment "anti-foreigner sentiment.

"This is not just against Roma. It's also against Jews," he said.

"I tell my daughter she needs to find a way to leave Hungary and find a more stable place to live. If I am being honest, I cannot tell my children that Hungary will be a good place to live in the coming years. I tell them to prepare to leave at any moment" Csillag added.

"The [official] Jewish community organizations must stop making compromises and speak much more loudly now. They believe they only have Jobbik to fear, but they should know better, that Fidesz is also the danger."

The romance of archeological discovery

One of the enjoyable things about writing this column is that I'm able to discuss some amazing archeological discoveries, especially as they pertain to the history of Israel. These discoveries have taken different forms. Some involve ancient writings, such as those found at Mari, Ugarit, and the Dead Sea. Others are of a more monumental and architectural variety, such as the massive gates found at Tel Dan and Ashkelon.

All of which raises the question, what constitutes an amazing discovery? Obviously, these finds must generate excitement to catch the public's attention. Often these discoveries are visually captivating and may have an element of a monumental nature attached to them, such as the aforementioned city gates, while at other times the appeal may be on a more emotional level, such as the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls.

Rarely does one run across a find that combines these elements. But such is the case with the discovery of a fourth- to sixth-century CE monumental late Roman synagogue with an inscribed mosaic floor, at Tel Huqoq in the Galilee this past summer, by a team led by professor Jodi Magness, holder of the Kenan Chair for Teaching Excellence in Early Judaism at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, who has been assisted by professor Michael Chazan, head of the Archaeology Centre at the University of Toronto.

It was Chazan who solicited my involvement in the project when he asked me, in my capacity as president of the Canadian Institute for Mediterranean Studies, if I could help raise the funds for U of T's participation in this worthwhile archeological endeavour.

It was a serendipitous moment since at the time I was involved with the Israeli and Italian consulates in looking for a worthwhile event for the Friendship Project celebrating the close co-operation between our two communities. What could be more ecumenical than to sponsor the excavation of a late Roman synagogue in the Galilee?

Such was the beginning of my involvement in what would become the major discovery of this past summer. It was important enough for Magness to be asked to deliver the keynote lecture at the Archaeological Institute of America's annual meeting a few weeks ago.

So what was it that caught the imagination about the synagogue and mosaic floor at Tel Huqoq? Needless to say, it was visually appealing. It was both unexpected and unusual for such a spectacular find to be discovered in an area that was off the beaten track.

Ultimately, it is the romance of discovery that catches the public imagination. Although some might think that the discovery of another synagogue in Israel is not a "big deal," I would like to extend a personal invitation to come and hear the charismatic excavator, Jodi Magness, speak on March 14 at 7:15 p.m., in Alumni Hall, 121 St. Joseph St., Room 400, at St. Michael's College, U of T, explaining why it is!

No poppy. No prunes. No problem.

For some aficionados, a hamantash just isn't a hamantash unless it's filled to the brim with a poppy seed or prune filling. And sure, traditionalists abound. But so do advocates of modern fillings that would make your bubbie's jaw drop.

Like at Tel Aviv's Lehamim Bakery, which offers hamantashen crammed full of amaretto, meringue with cream, marshmallows, strawberries and orange jam, and pistachio with rosewater. As the New York Times found, "The bakery uses butter in its dough, unusual for a kosher bakery, and makes about a dozen types, like one with spelt flour filled with sugar-free preserves, and savory quiche-like versions stuffed with potatoes and sesame seeds or feta cheese and beets." [http://bit.ly/purimfood10]

Esther, I've a feeling we're not in Shushan any more!

Now it's your turn. You can start with some relatively modest variations including Raspberry, Apricot or Coconut-Chocolate-Hazelnut. [http://bit.ly/purimfood11] From there, how about some Pecan Pie Hamantashen? [http://bit.ly/purimfood12]

Now you're ready for something a bit more daring such as Orange-Spiked or Poppy-Pecan-Honey (Shh! I snuck in a poppy-seed recipe.) [http://bit.ly/purimfood13] Or Cream Cheese or Raisin Almond or some of the more than 60 other recipes at the Jewish-food hamantashen archives. [http://bit.ly/purimfood14] But perhaps not too daring. If you're planning on leaving some hamantashen on my doorstep, I think I'll pass on the beef- and onion filled varieties, thank you very much. [http://bit.ly/purimfood15]

Chocolate has become almost as traditional as prune or poppy-seed hamantashen. But here's a recipe with a difference. These Chocolate-Peanut Butter Hamantashen actually infuse the chocolate into the dough, giving them a deep brown hue. And the cookie's pocket cradles the peanut-butter filling that is crowned with a dab strawberry jam. [http://bit.ly/purimfood16]

I have always found hamantashen pretty easy to manoeuvre: (1) Place in hand. (2) Eat. But here are two variations that actually have the treats mounted them on sticks. Hamantashen Truffle Pops are triangular cake pops that call for a generous supply of Oreo cookies. [http://bit.ly/purimfood17]

And in a case of Chanukah meets Purim, there is the unbelievable Deep-Fried Hamantashen on a Stick! It actually looks pretty simple. Take one standard hamantash. Dip it in funnel cake mix. Boil up some vegetable oil. Deep fry. Loosen your belt. [http://bit.ly/purimfood18]

I don't know whether Deborah Biskin has ever dined on deep-fried hamantashen. But I do know that she has written a charming memoir about the day she and her daughters stumbled on the best filling possible. [http://bit.ly/purimfood19]

"I suggested we use the traditional prune and poppy fillings, but Rachel and Jessica crinkled up their noses... I then hit on it: 'How about chocolate?'... Hours later, piles of hamantashen were strewn around the kitchen, some sticky with filling that leaked out the sides, some slightly burned and others just funny looking. I felt a sense of pride. My girls and I were actually doing a mitzvah together. Our results certainly were not esthetically or gastronomically perfect, but it came from the heart... I now realize that the flavour of the fruit or type of jam filling is irrelevant. The best hamantashen in the world are those filled with love."

Transcending antisemitism with humour

Rabbi Jeffrey Ableser

The esteemed chassidic Rabbi Naftali Horowitz of Ropschitz (1760–1827) is credited with giving the shortest-ever Shabbat sermon. The story is told that one Shabbat, he had been deep in thought and meditation for many days, alone in his study. He was summoned by his students at the appropriate time to deliver his weekly drashah on the Torah portion.

Rabbi Naftali appeared before the congregation. He began his sermon.

"We are told that a drashah should include three qualities: it should be true, it should be brief, and it should have the weekly Torah portion as its theme. I do not know what week it is, or for that matter, the weekly portion. This is true, it is brief, and it has the Torah portion as its theme. Amen."

When I was asked, many months ago, to contribute a rabbinic reflection for this week, I was not told what the portion would be, but I was told that it would be in the issue preceding Purim. Purim has for centuries been a day to celebrate Jewish humour. It is a day devoted to wine-drenched happiness. There's a rich tradition of creating Purim plays, or spiels, to mark the occasion. Before the modern era, when Jews have had a wildly disproportionate role is writing comedy for Broadway, radio and television, Purim spiels were the primary outlet for writing extended comedy pieces.

Where does Jewish humour come from? Freud and others felt it came about as a defence mechanism developed over generations of Jewish suffering. While it would be impertinent to question these theories, I believe there's another crucial factor that has contributed to the richness of Jewish humour. Humour comes about when we see the world from two mutually exclusive perspectives. Because Jews have lived as a minority in most of the countries of our sojourn, we were usually forced to see the world through "Jewish eyes" as well as the eyes of the majority culture. Both sets of eyes, and the values embedded in their worldviews, were seen to be true. We may have been in the minority, even an oppressed minority, but the Jewish way of looking at the world was at least as right as the view of the majority. When these worldviews collide, one can often encounter a joke.

(This theory of incongruity also explains why Canadians are disproportionately represented in comedy circles. In the words of comedian Martin Short, the reason why so many Canadians are funny is that Americans watch American television, and Canadians watch American television.)

Purim affords us a series of opportunities for half-crazed creativity that comes just once a year. From choosing and designing our Purim costume to the voices and sound effects we employ in the Megillah reading, and from the choice of fillings for our hamantashen to the most creative modes of drowning out the name of Haman, we each find ways to make the day our own.

Purim teaches us that sometimes the best way to confront antisemitism is by transcending it through humour.

Rabbi Jeffrey Ableser is spiritual leader of Congregation Beth El of Windsor, Ont.

Have a soulful Purim

Purim is a much misunderstood Jewish holiday. On the one hand, it's understood as an extremely joyous time for children. There are costumes and treat bags, and permission to boo and hiss while sitting in a synagogue listening to the chanting of a Jewish text. All other times, children are admonished to be silent and solemn while in the sanctuary, but not on Purim – the rowdier the better.

The adults also dress up, but not everyone feels the meaningfulness of costumes. The treat bags can become onerous when they start to number in the dozens. The booing and hissing in synagogue can get out of hand and trigger a headache. There is a commandment to drink, which of course raises logistical issues of driving home and dealing with the hangover the next morning. Somehow, it's lost its childish charm.

When we look at Purim, it seems to be entirely centred around the physical: the dress, the drink, the treats, hearing the Megillah, booing and hissing, and let's not forget the seudah, the Purim feast of food.

Where is the soulful aspect of the holiday? Where is the meditation and the reflection and the repentance? What Jewish holiday would only celebrate with the physical and not include a balance with the spiritual?

Actually, the spiritual side of Purim anticipates the physical side of the holiday. In other words, it occurs the day before Purim on the Fast of Esther. Historically, the fast is to commemorate Esther's three-day fast, during which she needed to decide if she was Persian first or Jewish first. She needed to question if her own safety was enough or if she should worry about her people. She needed to ask the tough, soulful questions, and only with the proper answers was Purim possible.

Midrashic Moments

There's no question that Purim represents the physical survival of the Jewish people in the face of outrageous odds. The topsy-turvyness of the holiday reminds us of the topsy-turvyness of our reality in a political materialistic world devoid of spirituality. Purim is, in fact, a tremendously adult holiday, but only if we recognize its dynamic.

Whether you choose to fast on the Fast of Esther or not, it's crucial to take some time on that day to remember the fundamental questions of our soul. As Esther asked herself, who are you as a Jew? Are you an island or part of a greater nation, and can you remain silent in the face of injustice?

Without those moments, Purim becomes a holiday of the body, that element of ourselves that God created from the lower realms, the earth. The midrash teaches us that humanity is the juncture point between the upper realms, the soul, and the lower realms, the body. Only through a balance of the two can peace be brought into the world.

Medical students sing and dance in annual fundraiser

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

On a frigid Sunday night in February, David Sheps is at Starbucks studying for a major exam. After Starbucks closes he moves to Tim Hortons, explaining that he can concentrate better with the background noise.

The first-year medical student says he's still adjusting to the heavy academic workload and he doesn't expect to get much sleep before the next day's exam.

Despite the demands of medical school at the University of Toronto, Sheps is still finding time to act and sing in Daffydil, the musical production put on annually by students at U of T's faculty of medicine. "I jumped at the chance to do it."

The show, an original theatrical production written, performed, directed and produced by faculty of medicine students, has been a U of T tradition for more than 100 years. In recent years, the show has been a fundraiser for cancer, and to date it has raised more than $600,000 for the Canadian Cancer Society.

Many Jewish students are involved in the show, from performing on stage to producing and fundraising. Daffydil 2013 runs from Feb. 20 to 23 at Hart House Theatre.

Sheps, who grew up in Thornhill, Ont., has been acting and singing for years. He attended summer theatre camps, he studied acoustic guitar and in Grade 12, he was in his high school's musical production.

As an undergraduate at York University, he participated in Vanier College Productions, acting in stage plays, doing improv theatre and singing in coffee houses.

Sheps says when he applied to medical school, he knew he wanted to be in Daffydil. "I even mentioned that in my interview."

He says he knew about the show from his uncle, Dr. Franklin Sheps, who had also been a participant.

Elan Panov, a second-year U of T medical student, had also heard about Daffydil when he was growing up. His mother, Dr. Rochelle Schwartz, had been one of the performers. "She always talked about Daffydil and she raved about the performers.

"When I was accepted to medical school, I knew I wanted to be a part of the show in one way or another. The problem is, I have zero talent. I can't act. I can't sing and I can't dance. The logical choice was to get involved in fundraising."

Panov says there were two reasons to do fundraising. Through his charitable work, he has acquired significant experience in promoting ticket sales and finding corporate sponsorships.

His second reason is personal. Since the production raises money for cancer, it was important for him to get involved to show support for a close family member who has cancer. "This is a way of helping my family member."

Second-year student David Ben-Israel, the co-producer of the show, says his "vision for the show" was to draw more awareness to cancer. "I wanted to make the event more cancer-focused."

To that end, he had planned to have a field trip to a cancer research centre for the band and cast, but he says it ended up being too difficult to organize a visit for so many people.

However, he did find a cancer survivor who will speak about his experience before the shows. "It's an opportunity for advocacy and for people to think about their support for the cause," Ben-Israel says.

He also made an effort to encourage students in the other schools in the faculty of medicine, such as occupational and physiotherapy and speech pathology, to participate in Daffydil.

When he saw the shows last year, he says he was inspired to get involved. As he has no previous experience acting, he ended up becoming a co-producer.

Ben-Israel has multiple responsibilities in this position. "If there's an artistic dispute, myself or the other co-producer mediate situation. We try to remain impartial."

However, sometimes he's just the chief schlepper, running errands such as printing sheet music and finding props.

As much as he'd love to be performing, Ben-Israel says co-producing has been a "wonderful learning experience in being a leader."

He says the production includes a main cast of 10, a 15- to 20-person chorus, and about six to eight dancers with a similar number of band members.

As a co-producer, he says he sat in on auditions and he attends all rehearsals.

Ben-Israel says the talent of the people involved in the show is very impressive.

One of the people he cites as being a big asset to the production is Michael Fridman, a second-year medical student with a solid theatrical background. "I've been involved in theatre since Grade 1," Fridman says.

He had tremendous stage fright when he was in kindergarten, but was encouraged to participate in a drama program at school as a way of overcoming this fear. "It transformed me to the person I am today.

"The more I performed, the more I saw the enjoyment in being onstage. It became addictive. It's an experience unlike any other."

He performed in several productions a year from grades 6 through 12, and as an undergraduate at Queens University, he participated in several theatrical shows.

Fridman, who was also in last year's Daffydil show, describes himself as "an actor who is able to carry a tune."

Participation in Daffydil is "a privilege," but it's also "an enormous commitment," he says. "You have to be a steward with your time. We have an exam the week following Daffydil. We also have to cover the same material as the other students with much more limited time."

Inna Genkin, a second-year medical student, is one of the show's dancers. She says juggling her time between performing and studying is a challenge, but she's having a lot of fun.

"When I saw the show last year, I thought it would be really cool to be part of it. But I can't sing for my life and I can't act. I'm not artistically inclined."

However, she's been dancing since she was a young child and so she auditioned. "I'm very excited to be part of Daffydil."

Sheps echoes her sentiments. "It's been a blast. It's so impressive watching people with so many diverse talents come together."

For tickets, visit www.daffydil2013.com.

Popular Vancouver rabbi to retire

Sharon Chisvin
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — Philip Bregman decided to become a rabbi when he was just 13 years old. More than 50 years later he admits that although he was young to make such a major decision, it definitely was the right decision to make.

"My decision to pursue this path has truly led to a very fulfilling life," says Rabbi Bregman.

In August, Rabbi Bregman will be retiring after 33 years as spiritual leader of Vancouver's Temple Sholom. During this time, he has grown the Reform congregation from the city's smallest synagogue to its largest, and in the process has connected hundreds of Vancouver Jews with their traditions, heritage and Israel.

Rabbi Bregman and his American-born wife, Cathy, arrived in Vancouver in the summer of 1980 from New Rochelle, N.Y., where Rabbi Bregman was serving as an assistant rabbi. The Vancouver appointment gave him the opportunity to return to Canada where he had been born and raised, first in Galt (now Cambridge), Ont., and then in Toronto.

In Toronto, Rabbi Bregman's parents joined Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut's Holy Blossom Temple and the rabbi became a mentor to their young son.

"Rabbi Plaut became the major rabbinic influence in my life," Rabbi Bregman says. "He set a very high standard."

Rabbi Plaut introduced Rabbi Bregman to the subtleties of Reform Judaism and to the discipline and dedication that it required.

Reform Judaism, Rabbi Bregman explains, demands extensive study of tradition and text, but also the desire and ability to go beyond what is written or proscribed in order to integrate observance with the contemporary world.

"I have tried to demonstrate this not only by my own personal practice of Judaism," Rabbi Bregman says, "but also by what I've taught here at Temple Sholom and beyond."

Longtime congregant Jack Lutsky says, "Rabbi Bregman is a 'doer' and makes things happen. His engagement with families to make the bar/bat mitzvah experience meaningful and his work with the sick and the bereaved are his greatest strengths."

Ellen Gordon, co-chair of the committee planning a farewell event in his honour on April 28, says, "He is warm to everyone he meets. He has a brilliant sense of humour."

Rabbi Philip Bregman and his wife, Cathy

Rabbi Bregman's commitment to social action, interfaith initiatives and Israel have been cornerstones of his tenure at Temple Sholom.

He has initiated numerous social justice projects over the years, and has determinedly built bridges between his synagogue and all other Jewish denominations and faiths.

He is the co-founder and chair of the Rabbinical Association of Vancouver, and enjoys a close relationship with the Orthodox Schara Tzedeck synagogue.

"We have something quite unique to Vancouver and to Canada, and that is a group of rabbis who honestly clearly respect and care for each other," says Rabbi Bregman. "We have our differences as to what we believe and observe, but the line of differentiation is almost non-existent."

Bregman's interfaith relationships are similarly positive. He is a co-founder of the Metro Vancouver Muslim Jewish Dialogue and the Vancouver Jewish Christian Dialogue. Last year, he travelled to Israel with Christian clergy, one of dozens of Israel tours that he has facilitated over the years.

He has continuously advocated for Israel, and has always welcomed children from other faith communities into his synagogue to learn about Judaism.

Bregman's rapport with children derives from the many years he has worked with bar and bat mitzvah students and taught at the Temple Sholom Religious School. Typically, he is quick to attribute the success of the school to former principal, Anne Andrew.

In fact, Bregman deflects much of the credit for Temple Sholom's myriad accomplishments to his staff and to his wife's support and advice.

"Cathy and I have worked together as a team," Bregman says. "Cathy has an incredible ability to identify what needs to happen to enhance the life of our shul, and then she points me in the right direction."

For three decades, Rabbi Bregman has been leading services, telling stories, sermonizing, mentoring, teaching, praising, counselling and consoling. It has meant instilling in his congregants a commitment to community, Israel, social justice, tolerance, tradition and change, and it has meant helping them become proud Jews and proud members of Vancouver's only Reform congregation.

Israeli ambassador cracks Maclean's Power 25 list

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Late last year, Israeli Ambassador to Canada Miriam Ziv received an unexpected honour: she was selected by Maclean's magazine for its annual "Power 25" list.

The list is a who's who of influential power players in the nation's capital and on Parliament Hill.

Ziv, now in her fifth and final year as ambassador, told The CJN she had never been nominated for anything like the "Power 25" before and that it came as a surprise.

"It was a 'wow' moment for me. But it was a great compliment, not only for me, but for Israel. Being the sole non-Canadian on the list in the company of 24 Canadians and having Israel represented out of all the other countries that work with Canada, is a special thing," she said on a recent phone call from the embassy in Ottawa.

Miriam Ziv

Others on the list included Prime Minister Stephen Harper, Liberal leadership front-runner Justin Trudeau, NDP Opposition Leader Thomas Mulcair, Bank of Canada Governor Mark Carney and Chief Justice of the Supreme Court Beverley McLachlin, to name a few.

The magazine nicknamed Ziv "the dogged envoy" in a nod to her tireless efforts to increase bilateral trade and strengthen cultural bonds between the countries.

Relations between Israel and Canada "have rarely been as warm" as they have been under the current Conservative government, which has helped the ambassador immensely in her role.

"As I said in my interview with the magazine, the relationship between our countries is exceptional. It was there when I came [to Canada]. It was my job to bring this relationship even closer," she said.

"And there were so many opportunities to do this. Everybody acknowledged the fact that [Israel] is a start-up nation... we have shared values and so much in common. Even with this, it takes time and it's a process to build on the existing relationships with politicians and ministers and also with Canadians as a whole."

Ziv noted how her work extends beyond the boundaries of Ottawa and the halls of power in Parliament. She also travels extensively throughout the country, meeting with universities, working with granting councils, and liaising with the premiers and legislatures of all the provinces and territories.

Her work, Ziv said, is "based on the fact that there is so much commonality between Canada and Israel in all areas."

As of last week, the ambassador was unsure when her superiors in Israel's foreign ministry would be calling to let her know her exact end date in Canada and who her replacement will be.

In the meantime, she continues to work a full schedule to bring Canadians and Israelis closer together.

"As I look back at 2012, we had a very busy year with visits from [Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu in March, [Israeli President] Shimon Peres in May and many other [Israeli diplomats and Knesset members] who came on working visits," she said.

"This is a sign of what kind of special relationship we have now with Canada, and it will continue."

Lawyer takes reins at anti-domestic violence group

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Becoming chair of the board of directors of Act to End Violence Against Women, is a logical next move for Alanna Salpeter, 31.

"I've always worked with people less fortunate than me. I feel responsible to them, and I have a desire to do what I can," said Salpeter, who began her two-year term in the fall.

Act to End Violence Against Women's mission is to end violence against women within the Jewish and broader community through education and advocacy.

An active member of the board of directors since 2010, Salpeter is the director of education at Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies.

A laywer by training with a master's degree in bioethics from Michigan State University – where she was involved with the sexual assault crisis intervention centre – Salpeter has been a visiting lecturer in the faculty of law at the University of Gambia, has consulted on the development of ethical health guidelines at several heath-oriented institutions in post-genocide Rwanda, has taught English in Japan, and has worked with University of Toronto's faculty of medicine and Public Health Ontario in bio-ethics research.

Alanna Salpeter

While in law school, she said, she was involved in pro bono work and represented a number of women who were involved in domestic abuse.

"My work with Act to End Violence Against Women is a continuation of everything I have done. I have a passion for treating humans everywhere equally," Salpeter said.

"In 2010, when I saw that the [the organization] was looking for board members, I thought that it would be a great way to use my skills. It is a small organization with a large mission, and it does incredible work."

In her new position, she said, she is encouraging both women and men to get involved in the organization.

"Although we are focused on violence against women, it is not simply a women's issue. It is a human issue that affects the fabric of our society: our mothers, our daughters, our sisters, our aunts, our friends and our children," she said.

"To that end, we are on the lookout for volunteers and welcome interest from anyone and everyone."

Toews seeks applications for security funding

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Public Safety Minister Vic Toews announced last week that the government is now accepting a new round of applications for its Security Infrastructure Program (SIP).

The $1-million annual fund is disbursed to successful applicants from communities at risk of hate crimes and is typically used to help defray the costs of security at schools, places of worship and other institutions.

Vic Toews

Items allowed for purchase under the program include alarm systems, fences, gates, lighting, security film for windows, closed-circuit television systems, exterior cameras (as well as their relocation), anti-graffiti sealant, motion detectors, signage and landscaping.

Training costs for proper use of new security equipment are also covered.

"Projects funded under SIP are cost-shared with communities and funds are matched dollar for dollar, up to $100,000," Toews said.

Initiated in 2008 as a three-year pilot program, SIP was declared a permanent program by the government in 2012.

Speaking to journalists at an ethnic media roundtable at his regional offices in Toronto last week, Toews said his ministry is calling for proposals from communities with a March 26 deadline for submissions.

"As part of our government's strong commitment to preventing hate crimes and making our streets safe, we are pleased to announce that [SIP] is once again accepting applications," he said.

"This program helps communities fight against hate-motivated crimes so that they can pursue their beliefs, culture, and activities peacefully, without fear of harm."

SIP is administered through the ministry's National Crime Prevention Centre.

Numerous Jewish community institutions have benefited from the program since 2008. Most recently, in January Toronto's Beth Tikvah Synagogue and Hamilton's Adas Israel congregation received some $32,000 each in SIP funding.

Asked whether the fund will remain capped at $1 million or if the government had any plans to increase it, Toews said there is no plan "at this time" to do so and that the government is trying to be fiscally responsible while still protecting communities.

Toews also told The CJN that the amount of intelligence being picked up by law enforcement in Canada around possible homegrown terrorist activity is "substantive."

Queried on whether the Canadian Jewish community or Canadians in general should be worried about a growing possibility of terrorist attacks domestically, the minister demurred before stating that he had full faith in law enforcement to keep communities safe.

However, Toews did encourage anyone with knowledge of possible terrorist activity within their communities to contact local or national law enforcement.

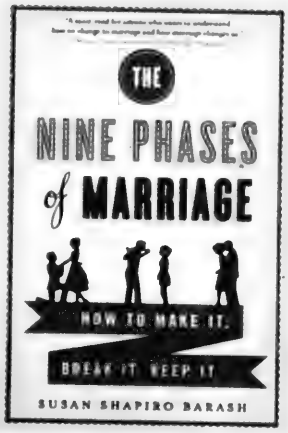
Book examines stages of marriage

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

As you embark on your marriage, you can't help but begin to compare it with the marriages around you. To what extent is your relationship like that of your friends? What goes on behind their closed doors, and is everything as picture perfect as it looks?

For her book The Nine Phases of Marriage (St. Martin's Griffin), Susan Shapiro Barash interviewed 200 women from across the United States to find out how they really felt about their marriages. She learned most of them wouldn't marry their husbands all over again. Using real-life examples, she relays their emotions in various stages of their marriages, examining how they feel about their relationships from honeymoon through housework and child raising.

For the married reader, there are lots of "aha!" moments in Barash's book, moments when it's easy to identify with the frustrations of women who had no idea marriage meant cleaning up after a sloppy husband or doing the majority of housework and child raising with no recognition for their efforts. Some said the feeling of partnership they had hoped for in their marriages was gone. Others felt fully justified in having affairs to satisfy needs their husbands weren't meeting.



Barash discusses the concept of an "un-divorce," when couples stay together for the sake of their kids or to continue appearances and a quality of life they've become accustomed to – but without any of the sharing or intimacy implied in marriage. And many women lamented the fact that their husbands just weren't the men they thought they were at the time when they said, "I do."

Barash paints a pretty sad picture of marriage for the most part. She defines the stages starting from the hopeful bride and her infatuation with a perfect wedding, a fantasy created by celebrity culture. Do most women want the wedding, or the marriage? she wonders. After wedding comes the perfect-wife phase, followed by child-centricity and midlife disappointment, as unhappiness and dissatisfaction creep into the lives of 70 per cent of wives. As loss of closeness and infidelity rear their combined heads, women start to look at their options, such as connecting with long-lost boyfriends through social media or exchanging heartfelt secrets with colleagues at work. If they make it to the golden years still married, in all likelihood they have learned how to handle their spouse, to accept marital conflicts and still make their partnerships work.

Most married women will be able to identify themselves in at least one stage of Barash's nine, though hopefully without the sense of betrayal, desperation and regret in many of the voices of the author's participants. A woman who has experienced divorce firsthand, Barash is not glib about it in the least. "For me, this was one of the most painful periods of my life, filled with remorse and murky memory, damage and despair," she admits in her preface. "Not being a wife was a profound loss of identity."

For each phase she discusses, Barash offers readers a prescription for how to deal with the stage they are going through. Her suggestions prompt reflectiveness and a feeling of camaraderie, a sense that others have stood in this same position and wrestled with similar issues. So for married women who wonder if anyone else has felt quite the way they do over the course of their married lives, sitting down with The Nine Phases of Marriage is like having a long, comforting conversation with a close friend who has, at her fingertips, a wealth of thought and information about the truly complex institution of marriage and how it plays out over a lifetime.

Family of dead Mossad agent receives compensation

Ron Friedman and Michal Shmulovich
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Israel has agreed to pay the family of Ben Zygier, a Mossad agent who committed suicide in 2010 in his cell at Ramle's Ayalon Prison near Tel Aviv, several million shekels in compensation.

The arrangement, which was supposedly made six weeks ago – after Zygier's family was notified about an internal investigation that concluded that he had killed himself – was reported by Ha'aretz on Friday, quoting an unnamed source familiar with the case.

News about the compensation comes amid reports that the state is looking into filing negligence charges against those who failed to prevent the inmate's suicide.

Zygier's family in Australia – he was born in Melbourne – has refused to comment on the case. "I really don't want to talk about it," his father said earlier last week before hanging up the phone on an Israeli TV reporter. "I've lost my son."

Reports Friday said the family was not told what charges had prompted Zygier's arrest and incarceration.

Meanwhile, retired senior Mossad official Rafi Eitan said Friday it is possible that there are other "Prisoner X's," people held in Israeli jails under assumed names, as Zygier was, for reasons linked to intelligence work.

Israel is not like other countries, given the regional challenges it faces, Eitan, 86, told Army Radio. "We're in an ongoing war that requires certain technologies."

A top Justice Ministry official told reporters last Thursday that there are no "Prisoner X's" in Israel and objected to the term, which was widely used at first to describe Zygier before his name became public knowledge. The official said it created the false impression that Israel was some kind of dictatorship or Third World country that strips its citizens of their rights. Zygier had been granted all the rights afforded to him by law, including family visits and a fair judicial process, the official said.

"There are no Prisoner X's in Israel," said the official. "The allegation that Israel behaved like a dictatorship that makes people 'disappear' is nothing but irresponsible and malicious nonsense." The official added that the entire process under which Zygier was held, and his case handled, was overseen by the most senior legal official in the judicial system.

Zygier's family was notified as soon as he was arrested, he received legal representation, and he was granted family visits, the official said. He was being tried in a regular criminal proceeding behind closed doors.

Ben Zygier

He said Zygier had been granted all the rights and protections due to him under Israeli law. Even the unusual fact that his identity was kept secret was a security measure to which Zygier himself consented, the official said, recognizing that this was beneficial to national security and to his own and his family's protection.

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, did not provide details about why Zygier was arrested and what he was charged with.

Avigdor Feldman, a defence lawyer who met with Zygier two days before he died, said the 34-year-old father of two had been charged with "serious criminal" offences and faced many years in prison. Conflicting, unconfirmed reports have indicated that Zygier had spilled Mossad secrets to the Australian authorities or media, or was believed to have been about to do so.

Although he was being held in a top-security jail cell under constant camera surveillance, and was reportedly considered a suicide risk, Zygier killed himself in the bathroom where there were no cameras, Israel's Channel 2 TV reported on Thursday. A transcript of the prison officials' panicked call for medical assistance to Magen David Adom – "he's hanged himself," the caller wailed – was read on Channel 10 News.

According to reports, Zygier immigrated to Israel in 2000, was recruited by the Mossad, and worked for the agency for years, including heading a front company that sold electronics to Iran, a country he was said to have visited several times, using his Australian passport. In Australia in 2009, he was reportedly called in for questioning by Australian security authorities. He was arrested and jailed in Israel in early 2010.

The Justice Ministry official did not rule out the possibility that ongoing restrictions on reporting the affair may be further eased, but stressed that the state would seek equally comprehensive media blackouts in the future, in cases that pose a national security risk.

Official handling of the affair has been greatly criticized in the past few days, since Australian media broke the story. Knesset members used parliamentary privilege to bring the case to the public's attention by asking about it during a Knesset session.

One legislator said he had made a formal inquiry into the matter while Zygier was being held and was assured the matter was being properly handled. And an effort to persuade editors to suppress the story has been derided as anachronistic and heavy-handed.

Dalia Dorner, a former Supreme Court justice and current president of the Israel Press Council, said in a Friday interview with Israel Radio that "self-censorship of journalists is unacceptable." She added that there's a possibility that some judges issue gag orders too easily.

Government officials and the military censor's office, however, have argued that gag orders and other restrictions on the case have been necessary to minimize the damage to Israel's national security.

'This decision is a betrayal of justice'

Philosopher, poet and writer Santiago Kovadloff mocked the government for the international criticism the pact has drawn. "But our government is not alone," he said. "Our government is with Iran."

President Cristina Fernández de Kirchner has defended the pact as a way to break a long impasse and Timerman said it as a way to promote justice.

Iran has until now resisted appeals by Argentina and Interpol to make available for interrogation top Iranian officials believed to have organized the attack, which killed 85 people and wounded hundreds of others.

The Argentine Parliament's upper house was scheduled to vote Feb. 21 on whether to ratify the memorandum, followed by a vote in the lower house on Feb. 27. Kirchner's political party enjoys a majority in both chambers and it is likely to pass.

Alberto Nisman, a lawyer representing AMIA, meanwhile filed a criminal complaint with federal authorities on Feb. 14 over a threat he received recently via email warning him to abandon his investigations of the bombings within 24 hours, or risk the well-being of his daughters.

Both the World Jewish Congress (WJC) and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) issued releases recently denouncing the Argentine-Iranian co-operation pact, saying having Iran on the commission investigating itself amounts to a farce.

CIJA chair David Koschitzky called the pact between the countries "disappointing."

"It is disturbing to think that any democracy – let alone one that suffered a mass bombing – would hand over its investigative duties to a 'truth commission' beyond its borders. That such a commission would be jointly established with the party implicated in the crime is added insult to those who were murdered at AMIA," he said in a Jan. 31 statement.

"For the victims' families and for the entire Jewish community of Argentina, this decision is a betrayal of justice that has already been long denied."

Adding further fuel to the fire, on Feb. 12 Iran denied it would consent to having its defence minister, Ahmed Vahidi, questioned by an Argentine judge about his role in the terrorist attack.

Vahidi, the subject of an international arrest warrant from Interpol in connection with the deadly bombing of the AMIA centre, would be questioned under the framework of the truth commission agreement, according to Timerman.

"The matter of questioning of some of the Iranian officials is a sheer lie," Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman Ramin Mehmanparast said at a news conference. "It seems that those who are concerned by the actual agreement are spreading such reports."

Timerman has said that seven Iranians with international arrest warrants against them would be interrogated under the agreement.

"I can assure that he will have to be present when the judge questions them, and he will be," Timerman said on Jan. 29 during his meeting with relatives of the victims of the AMIA bombing when he was asked about Vahidi.

In a joint Feb. 12 statement, WJC President Ronald Lauder and Latin American Jewish Congress president Jack Terpins said Iran is only interested in "perverting" the cause of justice.

"The memorandum of understanding with Iran undermines the efforts of the Argentine judiciary and of Interpol, whose investigations have clearly established that Iranian nationals conspired in masterminding the worst terrorist attack ever carried out in any South American nation," they said.

"At the time Iranian leaders, among them the current Defence Minister Vahidi, gave orders to kill as many civilians as possible. This deal with Iran is an affront to justice. The Iranian government cannot be considered a neutral interlocutor in this affair because its leaders are involved in terrorist activities themselves."

Bulgaria expels Hamas delegates

JTA

SOFIA, Bulgaria — Bulgarian security forces ordered a group of Hamas officials visiting Sofia to leave the country.

Ma'an, the Palestinian news agency, on Friday quoted a statement by Hamas, which said that delegates from its parliamentary party, Ismail al-Ashqar, Salah al-Bardawil and Mushir al-Masri, left Bulgaria shortly after being told to go. The three men arrived in Bulgaria on Feb. 13 for a five-day visit meant to show that representatives of Hamas, a designated terrorist group in Bulgaria and the rest of the European Union, were increasingly welcome in Europe, Ma'an reported.

According to the Hamas statement, the men entered Bulgaria "officially" but in statements last Thursday, a spokesperson for the Bulgarian government said the men had not been invited to Bulgaria, nor had they met with Bulgarian officials.

Ma'an quoted the Palestine Liberation Organization envoy to Bulgaria as saying that he was informed by the Bulgarian foreign ministry that it "regretted" the presence of the Hamas delegation and made the decision to ask them to leave. Ma'an said the Hamas group was invited by Bulgaria's Center for Global and Middle East Studies.

The PLO and Hamas are rivals for Palestinian power.

The head of the centre, Mohammed Abu Assi, told the Bulgarian news site Dnevnik that the visit was meant to "improve Bulgaria's image in the Arab world" after the country's government "made a blunder" by blaming Hezbollah for a 2012 bus bombing that targeted Israeli tourists in Burgas and killed six people. Hezbollah denies the accusations.

Antisemitic incidents near Marseille

JTA

PARIS — French police arrested two men in connection with recent antisemitic attacks near Marseille.

One of the suspects in the attacks in Aix en Provence, a Tunisian national without a visa, was placed in a detention centre, according to a Feb. 14 statement by the security affiliate of France's Jewish communities, SPCJ.

The first of the two incidents was on Jan. 28, when a group of 15 men assembled outside a synagogue in the town.

One of the men hurled a rock at the synagogue and shouted "Allahu akbar" and political slogans about "Palestine" "in a threatening way," SPCJ said in its report of the incident.

The suspects were arrested shortly after the second incident on Feb. 2, when two men approached the synagogue during an event attended by the Israeli consul.

They shouted "dirty Jew" at an SPCJ guard and profanities in Arabic and ran away when guards approached. The suspects were arrested after SPCJ informed police about the incident.

In a third incident, not believed to be connected with the suspects, two vagabonds on Jan. 29 urinated on a Jewish school adjacent to a synagogue. Interrupted by the guard, they said, "There's no one here but Jews – it smells like Jews here" and ran away, SPCJ reported.

On Feb. 4, a group of men robbed a 20-year-old Jewish man and beat him near Marseille's main railway station after noticing he was wearing a Star of David. Police defined the incident as antisemitic.

Israel aiming for the moon

SpaceIL, an Israeli non-profit made up of a team of scientists and space enthusiasts, is aiming to make Israel the third country, behind the United States and Russia, to successfully land a spacecraft on the moon. Part of Google's Lunar X Prize competition, SpaceIL intends for its spacecraft to be as small as possible, harnessing the latest in nanotechnology. It also recently received a significant boost when the Israeli telecommunications company, Bezeq, announced that it would provide an advanced communications infrastructure needed for spaceflight, Israel Hayom reported. Team SpaceIL's has received support from the Israeli Space Agency, Israeli Aerospace Industry, Asher Space Research Institute at the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology, Ramon Foundation and the Israeli Nano-Satellite Association. In order to win Google's $30-million Lunar X Prize, a private team must land a robot on the surface of the moon and send images back by the end of 2015. There are currently 25 teams from around the world competing.

Dubai bars Israeli soccer player

An Israeli soccer player for a British team is being forced to skip a team visit to Dubai because of the United Arab Emirates' policy on visits by Israelis. The 25-year-old striker, Itay Schechter, who plays for Swansea City, was prevented from attending the six-day group training session in the Persian Gulf city, the Jewish Chronicle reported last Wednesday. The United Arab Emirates does not have diplomatic ties with Israel, and Israeli passport holders can be arrested and deported on entering if they lack a special visa. Dubai is one of the UAE's seven emirates, or city states. In 2009, the Dubai Tennis Championships was levied a record fine over its country's refusal to award a visa to Israeli tennis player Shahar Pe'er. She received a visa and appeared in the 2010 tournament in Dubai.

No refugees from Israel

The Canadian government announced, effective Feb. 15, that Israel was added to the list of designated countries from which claimants seeking asylum as refugees will have their applications fast-tracked. Israel was determined by Canada to be among the "democratic countries that offer state protection, have active human rights and civil society organizations, and do not normally produce refugees."

Being detained at the Kotel

Rabbi Robyn Fryer Bodzin
Special to The CJN

It was either coincidence or bashert that I was in Jerusalem for Rosh Chodesh Adar and thus able to support and join the Women of the Wall (WOTW) for minyan. My colleague, Rabbi Debra Cantor of Connecticut, along with many male rabbinic supporters, awoke early and flocked to the Old City. We had all heard of Women of the Wall, but had never davened with them before.

At 7 a.m., I joined hundreds of women, as we opened our prayerbooks and began with the opening blessings. Behind us and beside us, on the other side of the mechitzah, were a combination of male supporters and photographers.

After a melodious Hallel, we left the Kotel en masse for Robinson's Arch to begin the Torah service, as is the custom of WOTW. I was very nervous as we sang and walked over, because I was supposed to read the fourth aliyah. However, that never happened, because as soon as I exited the metal detector at the Kotel plaza, a police officer asked for my identity papers. I explained that I had a Canadian passport, so she asked for that. When I asked her why, I did not receive an answer. At that moment, I realized I might not actually be able to attend my back-to-back meetings as a delegate of the Jewish Federations of North America's rabbinic cabinet anymore.

Guest Voice

Nine other women joined me at a satellite police station in the Old City. We stood in a courtyard and introduced ourselves to one another. While some of the women had been detained before, there did not seem to be a clear reason as to why others were chosen. David Barhoom, the WOTW lawyer who spent some time with us, could not even figure out why we were detained.

Throughout the morning, we were taken into an interrogation room, one at a time. While I was asked numerous questions, I also requested that the lovely Druze police officer answer some of my questions as well. It was important to me to know why I was there. He shared that my two crimes were that I violated the regulations of holy places and that I behaved in a way that may violate public safety.

It might not have been the right thing to do, but I laughed when he said that.

Rabbi Robyn Fryer Bodzin

How was it that only 10 out of hundreds of women were violating public safety? What was going to happen? We were not picketing or demonstrating. We were praying to God. It still makes no sense to me.

I have read many accounts of our situation last Monday morning, and I would like to clarify that we were detained, not arrested. There were no handcuffs involved. We were not placed in a cell. The experience was surreal, not scary. In fact, my only fear was that I would miss my flight, which was scheduled for later that night.

After some time, the officers brought us tea and we began to chat with them. I asked one of them if he liked to babysit women who don't actually commit crimes. With a smile, he responded that he did it every month. The sense that I got was that these officers go through this processing routine every month, and they, too, think it is ridiculous. But, they have a job to do.

After some time, we were told that we could be released, as long as we signed a surety document that stated we would not come to the Kotel for 15 days. I signed the document, and then at about noon, we were taken from the satellite police station to a larger one. Once there, we were fingerprinted and had our pictures taken. And then we were free to go.

I have more faith and love in the Jewish People because of the overwhelming positive response I received following this experience. The status quo will change. But change takes time, and Israel is not even 65 years old yet. I have faith that her golden years will shine on all Jews, no matter our religious affiliation.

Originally from Toronto, Rabbi Robyn Fryer Bodzin, is spiritual leader of Israel Center of Conservative Judaism in Queens, N.Y.

Customers injured in stampede for bargain tablets

Aaron Kalman
The Times of Israel

BE'ER SHEVA — Not since Moses have the people of Israel been so obsessed with tablets. Last week, a shopping centre's promotion sale of the nifty computers ended in mayhem with 10 people injured in a stampede for a bargain.

The store management decided to donate 500 tablets, instead, to the city's welfare services for distribution.

The BIG centre in Be'er Sheva put seven-inch tablets on sale for only 10 shekels ($2.70 Cdn) in a promotion that attracted thousands long before the planned 4 p.m. discount took effect.

People were trampled by the seething mob, and Magen David Adom ambulances were called to the scene. Medics treated 10 people – most with light injuries, but two who required hospital treatment. Others needed medication to help them calm down, and many had their clothes torn and damaged.

Police ordered the store to cancel the sale and moved to restore order. "I was sorry I came, and I fled away as fast as I could," one woman said. "It wasn't worth dying to save a few hundred shekels."

App will allow real time phone voice translations

David Shamah
Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — Israeli start-up Lexifone, which runs an automatic phone conversation translation service, is set to come out with an Android app that will enable smartphone users to call people all around the world and speak in their own language, while the listener hears the message in theirs.

It's an impressive system, based on advanced algorithms and clever use of voice-to-text technologies. Lexifone, barely two years old, is used by millions of people around the world and is proof that high-tech in Israel can thrive outside the Tel Aviv bubble.

Lexifone services allow customers and vendors in countries around the world to ensure that deals run smoothly. For example, a hotel in Spain can set up a phone number for tourists from France, who can call and book rooms in French, with the desk clerk on the other side of the line hearing the request in Spanish. It works with Spanish, French, Portuguese, German, Italian, Russian, Mandarin, and English. Hebrew is on the way, the company says.

Lexifone started out in the first incubator round of Haifa's Hi Center, which just graduated another four start-ups from its Top Start-Up accelerator. Top Start-Up, which began last October, was the first accelerator for new start-ups in the Haifa area, offering companies office space, mentoring, and partnerships with companies such as Microsoft.

Ike Sagie, CEO of Lexifone

Four companies participated in the newly graduated Top Start-Up group: YouMe, which is developing health-related cellphone apps; OptiCar, which is working on making the car rental process more efficient; WebSnacks, which is developing a content distribution center for tablets; and Dalit Technologies, with a smartphone-based system to manage agricultural enterprises.

All these companies hope to follow in the path of Lexifone, so far Hi Center's most successful graduate. In 2011, Lexifone got a $2-million investment from Canadian web branding company Intertainment Media.

Anthony Pearlman, president and COO of Intertainment, said the Toronto-area company first learned of Lexifone at the Mobile World Congress in Barcelona. "They were part of an Israeli government-sponsored group showing its technology," he said.

"I was interested in their technology from day one… We're very cognizant that there are a lot of smart applications and solutions coming out of Israel," he said.

For its $2 million, Intertainment obtained a 25 per cent stake in Lexifone.

Pearlman believes that given the prevalence of language barriers, Lexifone's voice translation solution "represents the next step in the evolution of global communications."

Referring to Ortsbo, an Intertainment subsidiary, he said Lexifone's solution "is one we're looking at growing and integrating with the text translation at Ortsbo."

Lexifone recently declared it was seeking to raise $10 million in a second round of financing. However, Intertainment won't participate in that financing, Pearlman said.

Tech magazine lauds airport debris detection system

David Shamah
The Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — Israel's XSight Systems, which detects runway debris that can endanger planes and passengers, has been called one of Israel's most innovative companies by U.S. tech magazine Fast Company.

"Foreign object debris (FOD) costs the aviation industry around $13 billion (US) per year," and is a major safety risk, Fast Company wrote about XSight, naming it one of the top 10 Israeli innovators for 2013. The XSight system "has emerged as one of the leading solutions, using hybrid radar and electro-optical technology to detect junk on runways," the magazine wrote.

XSight's premier product, FODetect, uses hybrid radar and electro-optical technology to detect junk on runways, with units installed together with runway lights, ensuring that all parts of the runway are constantly monitored. When debris is detected, the control tower is alerted and can contact the pilots and hold up flights as necessary. The system's GPS, meanwhile, alerts ground crew to exactly where the debris is located, enabling them to quickly remove it without holding up flights.

Runway debris is a serious safety issue in the airline business, and has been responsible for damage to aircraft and even crashes. One of the most well-known instances of an FOD-related tragedy occurred in 2000, when an Air France Concorde supersonic plane caught fire, exploded and crashed into a hotel within minutes of takeoff. All passengers and crew on the flight were killed, as were some hotel employees. The death toll reached 113.

The reason for the crash: a 17-inch metal strip that fell off a plane that had taken off minutes before. The pilot didn't see it – he was too high off the ground. The ground crew missed it, too, and as a result, more than 100 people lost their lives.

According to Alon Nitzan, president and CEO of XSight Systems, the product has been installed at Boston's Logan, Paris' Charles de Gaulles and Tel Aviv's Ben-Gurion airports and others.

"We take pride in being on this honourable list. Beyond that we are happy to contribute to the state of innovation in the world's economy driven by the aviation industry. XSight's innovative runway management solution provides leading airports with improved runway safety, increased runway capacity and enhanced operational efficiency," said Nitzan.

"The company will continue to develop its innovative technology to deliver crucial benefits to airport operators and answer growing needs."

The Book of Esther

Bill Gladstone
Special to the CJN

Novelist Susan Glickman is the latest in a series of Canadian novelists, scholars, scriptwriters and performance artists to become enchanted by the legend of Esther Brandeau, the first known Jew to set foot in New France.

As a young single Jewish woman, Esther Brandeau would not have been allowed to sail on the French ship St. Michel from the French port of La Rochelle to Quebec as she did in 1738. She travelled in the guise of Jacques La Farge, an ostensibly Catholic teenaged boy seemingly not quite old enough for the razor.

When and where Esther's true identity was discovered, whether while still at sea or once the ship had docked at Quebec, is not known. But Esther was interrogated intensively and the stories she told of her extravagant adventures have been set down in the public record, preserved in archives in both Canada and France. As historian-scholar Isidore Goldstick wrote in the Canadian Jewish Chronicle in 1945, Esther "turned out to be a quaint combination of hobo and adventuress, renegade and Jewess."

She was the daughter of David Brandeau, a Sephardi Jew who lived in a suburb of Bayonne in southwest France. Five years earlier, her parents had put her on a Dutch ship and she was to sail to family members in Amsterdam, but the ship was wrecked.

That was fortunate for Esther, since her family had intended to marry her off to an elderly widower. Saved by one of the crew, she determined to wear male clothes and become an adventuress. She worked under various names as a ship's boy, a tailor's errand-runner, a domestic, a baker's assistant and an infantry captain, and was even jailed for theft shortly before sailing for the New World.

Esther's status as a Jew was a huge problem and embarrassment for the French authorities. Although she claimed she wanted to eat pork and other forbidden meats and "to enjoy the same liberty as the Christians," she resisted every attempt to convert her to Catholicism at a time when non-Catholics were barred from settling in New France. She remained a year in Quebec before being deported back to France and disappearing from the pages of history.

In her fictional work The Tale-Teller (Cormorant Books), Glickman highlights Esther's crafty ability to tell fascinating and beguiling stories about herself and her adventures that keep her listeners spellbound. Many of the details she gleans from books (such as Robinson Crusoe) in the library of her host, Intendant Hocquart, in whose home she becomes a temporary servant while her case is being decided. During that interval she acts as a Jewish Scheherazade, spinning charming, almost spellbinding tales in order to win a reprieve from deportation.

Wishing to become an indispensible member of the household, Esther tries to seduce her hosts with her culinary skills. Having brought a bag of cocoa beans with her from New France, she cooks them, pounds them into a mortar, adds almonds, hazelnut, sugar, vanilla, cinnamon, nutmeg and an egg, and pours the whipped concoction into a cup for Monsieur Hocquart.

"He was delighted, proclaiming that Esther's chocolate was the finest he had ever tasted; better than the beverage served in the finest homes in France; better than that Beauharnois drank every morning for breakfast to give him stamina for his amorous and military conquests. Hocquart had often drunk chocolate at other people's houses but no one in his staff knew how to prepare it properly. Esther having revealed this talent, he would be happy to drink chocolate morning, noon and night."

The Tale-Teller is likewise an appealing confection, a colourful historical adventure-fantasy and a skilful imagining of the inhabitants of New France in its early period before 1759. Although it seems more a story than a full-fledged novel (it lacks rising action or character development, for example), that shouldn't prevent it from winning any awards. Glickman's novel The Violin Lover took the fiction prize in the Canadian Jewish Book Awards in 2006.

Numerous other writers have embellished Esther's historical legend since historian Benjamin G. Sack wrote about her in an historical essay in The Jew in Canada, a large volume about the Jewish community of Canada published in 1926.

Mrs. Gitelle Goldwater Betensky wrote a television script about Esther in 1963 in which Esther remains a loyal Jewess who rejects baptism while nobly upholding the faith of her ancestors. "I'm sorry, Father," Betensky's Esther explains, "my heart wouldn't be in it. My heritage and strength lie in the teachings of my parents and forefathers. A Jewess I was born and a Jewess I must remain."

Sharon McKay's 2004 novel, Esther, which was shortlisted for a Governor General's Award, supposedly remains much more faithful to the known facts of the case.

Perhaps the most successful of the modern reinterpreters of the Esther Brandeau legend is poet-scholar Heather M. Hermant. Several years ago, Hermant received a grant of $80,000 from the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada to write a scholarly thesis, Queer, syncretic triangulations: Mapping Esther Brandeau from France to New France, 1738, a four-year project due for completion in 2014.

Hermant has also assembled and performs in a "multidisciplinary performance installation" about Esther titled Ribcage: this wide passage – the title a punning reference to the method by which Esther supposedly bound or "caged" her breasts so as to avoid detection. In her description of the piece, Hermant calls Esther "an outed female, and an outed Jew," adding: "Who outed her on either count, and how, remains in question."

What also remains in question, of course, is how applying the vernacular and gender concepts of the 21st century to an 18th-century historical figure can increase our understanding of her. Such exercises, it seems, often end up revealing more about ourselves than anyone else.

Glickman, at least, seems to be removing layers of varnish rather than adding them.

Love is in the air in Paris-Manhattan

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

First-time French director Sophie Lellouche, in Paris-Manhattan, takes viewers to Paris on a magical quest for an elusive goal – romantic love.

The 2011 film, hosted by the Chai Tea & A Movie series, is scheduled to be screened on Sunday, Feb. 24 at 5 p.m. at the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Cinemas (4861 Yonge St.)

The spirit of the American director Woody Allen infuses Lellouche's cinematic valentine. He appears in fleeting excerpts from his own films, as well as in a surprising cameo role.

Allen, the object of Alice Ovitz's admiration and infatuation, seems to be her alter ego. Ovitz (Alice Taglioni), a single woman in her early 30s, is a pharmacist who seeks a suitable companion to ward off the painful pangs of loneliness. Her sister is married, but she appears to be hurtling toward spinsterdom.

As she waits for the blessed day when a handsome and intelligent man will sweep her off her feet, relieving her of angst about the future, Alice glances at a poster of a neurotic Woody Allen in her bedroom.

Alice Taglioni and Patrick Bruel in Paris-Manhattan

She likes him because he makes her laugh and "speaks" to her. In imaginary conversations, Allen assures Alice that life can be good and that work and sex are life's most essential needs.

With a few quick skillful strokes, Lellouche creates the cloistered world of a soulful middle-class Parisian Jewish woman who's defined and demarcated by family and profession.

Just when everything seems so hopeless, Alice runs into Victor (Patrick Bruel), the proprietor of a security alarm company. Victor, at first glance, appears grossly unsuitable. He is considerably older and, horrors of horror, he has never even seen a Woody Allen movie.

Nonetheless, Victor makes some headway, thanks in no small part to Allen's sage advice.

The implicit message in Paris-Manhattan, a modestly conceived film distinguished by uniformly fine performances, is that care and consideration can sweep aside burdensome obstacles and, maybe, even lead to a flowering of mutual love.

Drake wins Grammy for his latest album Take Care

JTA

The Jewish Canadian singer Drake won a Grammy Award, his first, for rap album of the year.

Also, the indie pop band Fun. won song of the year with We Are Young and best new artist at the 55th annual Grammy Awards on Feb. 10 in Los Angeles. Its lead singer, Jack Antonoff, is Jewish, and he thanked all the band's fans after Fun. won in the latter category.

> Also nominated for best rap song

"We've been touring for 12 years and we haven't made money for a very long time," he told the crowd, extending a shout-out to girlfriend Lena Dunham of Girls fame.

For Drake, his album Take Care brought him the Grammy before the televised portion of the show began. He beat out Lupe Fiasco, Nas, The Roots and Rick Ross.

The former Degrassi actor had been nominated 10 times before breaking through this year. He also was nominated for best rap performance for his song HYFR and best rap song for The Motto.

Fun. also performed at the Grammys, playing its hit Carry On during a staged indoor rainstorm at the Staples Center.

In his introduction of the group, actor Neil Patrick Harris said, "As legendary gangsta rap icon Katharine Hepburn once said, 'If you obey all the rules, you don't have any fun.'"

Aubrey Drake Graham was born in Toronto in 1986 to Dennis Graham and Jewish mother Sandi (Sher) Graham.

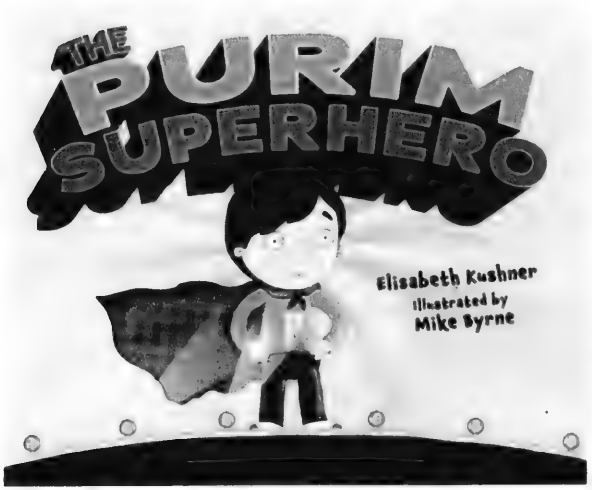
Children's book about being Jewish in a gay family



Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

Although Nate wants to be an alien for Purim, all the other boys are dressing up as superheroes.

He asks his two dads for input and learns that it's OK to be yourself, and that it may seem lonely at times to follow your own instincts, but doing so can also give you strength.

Elizabeth Kushner

That's the gist of The Purim Superhero, a children's book by Vancouver author Elizabeth Kushner published by KarBen, which recently won Keshet's LGBT Jewish children's book contest.

The book is about a gay Jewish family and being different, Kushner says. "My favourite books are about more than one thing at once, and let the reader, at least to some extent, find their own message in the story, and that's what I tried to accomplish with The Purim Superhero," she reflects.

"So, for one child, the most important aspect of this book may be that Nate has same-sex parents, while another may be reassured by the idea that there's more than one way to be a boy, and someone else might like that there are aliens in it –or superheroes, for that matter."

Herself a Jewish parent, lesbian, writer and librarian for the Vancouver Public Library, Kushner says the holiday of Purim presented a perfect opportunity to tell the story.

"Purim seemed like such a natural theme for a children's book, with many of the appealing qualities of Halloween and April Fool's Day. It's about 'coming out' as yourself – Esther is a great example of someone who comes out of the closet for a good cause – and I thought that would be a good setting for a book about a kid with gay parents and a costume crisis."

She gave her character two dads rather than two moms because, she says, there aren't as many children's books featuring two-dad families.

"I wanted my male protagonist to have trusted adults in his life who were also not conventionally masculine – hence Nate's dads, who, without making too big a deal out of it, cook, and sew, and are very nurturing."

On tour to promote The Purim Superhero, (Kulanu Toronto was scheduled to have a live chat with her on its Facebook page on Feb. 17) Kushner is thrilled her book has been so warmly received and hopes it will encourage kids to respect what's individual and unique in themselves.

"I hope it will teach them to pay attention to the voice inside themselves that tells them what's important to them. I think both of those are very Jewish values, and that living them takes a fair bit of courage," she says.

The Purim Superhero is intended for kids age four through nine.

TORONTO JEWISH FILM FESTIVAL PRESENTS

PARIS MANHATTAN

The perfect antidote to the midwinter blues! Idealistic pharmacist Alice is still single, much to the dismay of her quirky family. She takes refuge in Woody Allen movies. In her daydreams, she has long talks with the filmmaker, asking him about everything from love to work. When she meets Vincent (played by the gorgeous Patrick Bruel from Un Secret and Five Brothers), her life gets turned upside down. A charming romantic comedy that's "as bubbly and lively as Paris in spring" (Le Figaro). Paris Manhattan features a delightful array of oddball characters, as well as a playful cameo by Allen himself that will definitely make you smile.

Goalie racks up honours at NCAA Division III school

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

According to a recent game summary, Plymouth State University's Ali Ponte stopped 29 of 30 shots to lead the Panthers to a 2-1 victory over St. Michael's College.

That's a .967 save percentage – pretty good in any hockey league, including the Eastern College Athletic Conference (ECAC) Women's East, a Division III program.

While any goaltender would be happy with that statistic, you'd have to go back to earlier in the year to see just how good a season Ponte is having. In the Codfish Bowl Tournament – a New England tradition – the Richmond Hill native stopped 97 of 105 shots over two games, including a 64-save effort against Lake Forest University. The performances, albeit in a losing cause, led to Ponte being named to the All-Tournament Team.

Around the same time, Ponte was named to the ECAC Women's East Weekly Honor Roll, marking the fourth time she'd received the recognition.

And then last week, she did it again. Following a 1-1 tie with New England College in which she stopped 33 of 34 shots, she was named to the ECAC Women's East Weekly Honor Roll for the fifth time. Ponte made 12 saves in a hectic third period to help the Panthers kill three out of four penalties.

Ponte, a third-year player who's studying environmental sciences, has been a key factor in Plymouth's bid to make the playoffs for the first time ever.

So far this season, she's sporting a 3.39 goals against average to go along with a .916 save percentage.

Given the rubber she's seen, she's pretty happy with the results. Speaking on the phone from New Hampshire, Ponte said she doesn't mind seeing as many pucks as she did in the Codfish bowl. "I like getting shots, which is one of the things I like about being on the team," she said.

Going to Plymouth, Ponte knew she'd likely see plenty of action. "It's a new program, with a new culture," she said. The team's goal was to just get into the playoffs.

Now a junior in the hockey program, Ponte got a rude, if not unexpected, welcome to the league in her freshman year: "In my first year, we won only one game. It was kind of a rough year."

Three-quarters of the players were freshmen like her, and last year, the difficulties continued. Conference powerhouse Norwich twice directed more than 50 shots at her in 14-0 pastings. In one, Ponte was pulled after allowing six goals in two periods. Her replacement allowed eight goals in one period. In one of the contests, her team replied with five shots of their own.

Overmatched? Undoubtedly. But this season, the Panthers are challenging for a playoff spot. At The CJN's press time, the Panthers were 4-15-3 overall with three games remaining, versus Castleton, Saint Anselm College and UMass Boston. One win out of the three would clinch a playoff berth.

For Ponte, being counted on to backstop the team and give it a chance to win is something she relishes. "I love the pressure of being a goalie," she said. "Even if your team doesn't score, if you don't let in a goal, you won't lose."

Ali Ponte

Like many kids of her generation, Ponte started skating at an early age and was playing hockey at eight. At around 10, she switched full time to netminding, attending goalie camps in the summer and playing against boys right up to Grade 10.

After playing for Markham Stouffville in the Provincial Women's Hockey League, the premier women's hockey league in Ontario, she was recruited by Plymouth, earning a partial scholarship.

Given her experience playing at a top level in Ontario – "lots of girls [from the league] do end up on the Canadian Olympic team" – Ponte added a level of stability and leadership to the Panthers' roster.

She's got one more year at Plymouth next season, and after that, she'll move to British Columbia to study geology in grad school and play in a women's hockey league.

"I just love the game. I want to play for the fun of it," she said.

Jaffe, Nystrom to coach U.S. Maccabiah hockey team

Compiled by CJN Staff

NHL Network analyst William (Billy) Jaffe and Dallas Stars player Eric Nystrom will serve as head coach and assistant coach, respectively, for the U.S. hockey team at the Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Jaffe participated in the 15th Maccabiah Games as captain of the U.S. hockey team, leading them to a silver medal. He also played hockey for the University of Michigan from 1987 to 1989.

Prior to his work for the NHL Network, he was colour analyst for the New York Islanders, Versus Network, MSG Network, NESN and Rogers Sportsnet.

"Going to Israel in 1997 as the team captain was a fun learning and cultural experience that I wouldn't have had if it wasn't for ice hockey," Jaffe said.

"My expectations are to help the players understand what a wonderful opportunity it is to experience something unique and special like the Maccabiah Games. It will be an incredible athletic and life experience."

The United States is expected to ice a strong team, with many NCAA Division 1 players to draw from. Canada has announced its team, which consists of players from the NCAA, major junior leagues and non-NHL professional ranks.

Mike Keenan, a Stanley Cup-winning coach with the New York Rangers, will coach the Canadian entry.

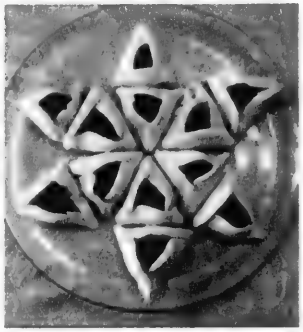
Nystrom, the son of former New York Islander Bob Nystrom, has experience representing the United States at various levels: he played in the under-18 World Championship and in the World Championships in 2010.

Nystrom attended the University of Michigan, qualifying for the all-rookie team during his debut season and becoming the captain during his final year.

His NHL career has included stints with the Calgary Flames, who took him in the first round of the 2002 entry draft, the Minnesota Wild and currently the Dallas Stars.

The ultimate in homemade hamantashen

Randy Fingrut
Special to The CJN



It isn't Purim without hamantashen. Granted, at Purim it's important to sing songs, hear the Megillah and tell the story of Purim, which are also lots of fun. However, as soon as those activities are done, we look for the triangular shaped pastries stuffed with yummy fillings like dried or fresh fruits, poppy seeds, chocolate or cream cheese. We eat hamantashen because they are delicious, but we should know that these triangle pastries, symbolic of hats, ears or pockets, represent the annihilation of the villain Haman.

Preparing and baking your own hamantashen should be an enjoyable event. No one should have the experience of baking hamantashen that leak out filling all over the baking sheet, spread apart while baking and/or totally lose their shape.

Even if you have had difficulty in the past, review the following guidelines and you will be able to master any hamantash recipe with ease and turn out tasty, beautiful batches on your first try.

Dough

Chill the dough. This makes it easier to roll and prevents spreading during baking.

Roll the dough to a consistent 1/4-inch thick. This will make it easier to handle and shape. Only roll the scraps once, or pastry will be tough.

Use a round cookie cutter, no smaller than 3 to 4 inches in diameter. Anything smaller will be too difficult to work with.

Brush the edges of the circles with egg wash before filling.

Filling

The filling should be thick to prevent running while the hamantashen are baking. It's best to follow a tested hamantashen filling recipe. Using jam on its own is not a good idea, as it will run. Mix jam with dried or fresh fruit for a better result.

Check the recipe to see if the filling should be chilled before using. Chilling the filling makes it less sticky and easier to handle. Note, however, that this does not apply to chocolate fillings.

Do not overfill the hamantashen. For a 3- to 4-inch pastry circle, use about one teaspoon of filling. Any more will cause the hamantashen to spread open and/or leak. Place the filling in the centre of the circle.

Folding

Do not pinch your hamantashen! We all seem to have an instinct to pinch and we must overcome it. Hamantashen need to be folded into neat triangles much like packing a carton, with one "flap" overlapping the other.

Baking

Double up baking sheets for more insulation to protect pastries.

Use parchment paper on the baking sheet to prevent any sticking.

Place baking sheets on the middle rack of the oven.

THE ULTIMATE HOMEMADE HAMANTASHEN

Pick one filling or double up the dough and try them both!

Prune Filling

2 cups pitted prunes
1 cup soft raisins (dry raisins may be plumped by soaking them in warm water)
1 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
2 tsp. pure vanilla extract
1/2 cup orange marmalade

Combine the ingredients in the food processor until smooth. Chill for a minimum of one hour.

Chocolate Chip Cheesecake Filling

1 cup cream cheese
2 tbsp. honey
1/2 cup sugar
1/8 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. pure vanilla
1/2 cup semi sweet chocolate chips

Combine cream cheese, honey, sugar, salt and vanilla in the food processor until smooth. Add the chocolate chips and pulse until most of the chocolate chips are grated into the cheese filling. Chill for a minimum of one hour.

Dough

3 eggs
1/2 cup sugar
1 tsp. pure vanilla
1/2 cup vegetable oil
3 cups all-purpose flour
1 1/4 tsp. baking powder
1/4 tsp. salt
1 egg plus 1 tsp. water, lightly beaten, as egg wash for cut dough circle
1 egg white, lightly beaten, for coating unbaked hamantashen

Using the food processor or electric mixer, combine eggs and sugar until smooth. Add the vanilla and oil until combined. Add the flour, baking powder and salt, mixing just until it begins to come together. Remove dough from work bowl onto a floured pastry board or counter. Sprinkle with flour and knead dough until it is smooth. Flatten dough, cover it with plastic wrap and refrigerate for a minimum of one hour.

Divide dough into two and roll one section, either on a floured board or between two pieces of parchment paper, until it is 1/4 inch thick. Cut dough into circles with a 3 inch or larger round cookie cutter.

Brush the edge of each circle with the egg wash, then place a teaspoon of filling in the centre.

There will be 3 flaps to create the triangle. Start at the left side and make a flap folding in towards the centre. Make another flap at the right side folding in towards the centre, overlapping the left flap at the top and creating a point. Fold up the remaining flap to complete the triangle. When folding, tuck the left side of the last flap under the left flap while leaving the right side over top of the right flap. Each side of the triangle should have a flap that folds over and a corner that folds under. Brush the top of each hamantash with the egg white.

Bake in a preheated oven at 350 for 15 to 20 minutes, or until golden.

Argentine musician to work with at-risk youth

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Simja Dujov's name means "Happy Soul," and that's exactly what people can expect to see on stage when he makes his Canadian debut at Toronto's Lula Lounge.

The Argentine musician arrived in the city on Feb. 17 and will be in town until March 1 as part of an artistic residency with the Koffler Centre of the Arts and the Ashkenaz Foundation.

The two-week residency is filled with workshops and master classes, and it will culminate in a group performance of Dujov and six other culturally and musically diverse musicians at Toronto's Lula Lounge on Feb. 27.

Working with SKETCH, an organization that brings cultural opportunities to Toronto's homeless and underprivileged youth, Dujov will run a music workshop with 10 at-risk youth. Together, they will collaborate on an original composition.

"I'm very excited to work and see what blends we discover together," he told The CJN over the phone from Buenos Aires. "We can share as much as we can about our music and culture and ideas, so we can have deeper cooperation."

Dujov will bring to the mix his own blend of Latin klezmer and gypsy cumbia, with a touch of surf-style music. The 30-year-old musician describes his sound as the music of his hometown of Córdoba, Argentina, portrayed as if his city had sand and waves – which it doesn't.

"It's a way of imagining how my city would be like and a way of creating my own new world with music," he says.

Dujov has been playing music his whole life, but discovered klezmer when he was in university studying classical composition and symphonic music. One of his professors directed a Yiddish choir. Knowing that Dujov was Jewish, he invited him to sing.

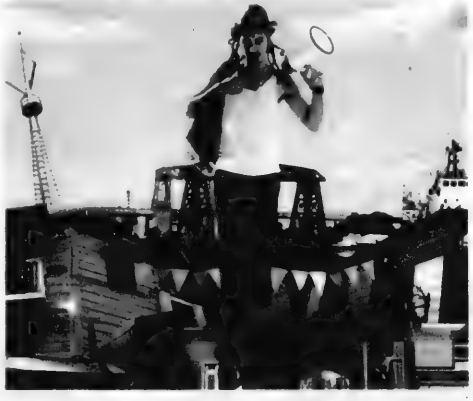
Although most of the participants were in their 70s, Dujov describes the rehearsals as having the atmosphere of a party.

"I went into this Yiddish culture by sharing this moment with these kind of grandparents," Dujov jokes.

Soon after, he began to perform at weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs, and in synagogues before starting his own klezmer band.

While he was travelling in New York City and Tel Aviv in 2008, he decided to form a band that played original music. It was then that he realized how different Jewish life can be around the world.

"I grew up listening to Jimi Hendrix and Latin American music, but that doesn't make me less Jewish than a guy born in Jerusalem, wearing a big hat and a beard," he says, adding that it was travelling that taught him to discard the fixed ideas he had of how people live around the world. "That makes you feel more free for your life and your own musical creation."



About his visit to Canada, Dujov says he's excited to see how Canadians live – and he's especially looking forward to the visit since he has been reading a biography of poet and singer Leonard Cohen, who he describes as one of his inspirations.

Born Gabriel Dujovne, Dujov picked his stage name to represent his love of parties. "Simja" is a Spanish spelling of simchah, and "Dujov" is translated as "soul" from Russian.

His album is called Santificaras la fiesta, which is a play on the Spanish translation of the fourth commandment to "Remember the Sabbath day, and keep it holy." In Spanish, both religious holidays and "parties" are called fiesta, so he used a play on words to "make sacred the fiestas."

"We don't need to be holy just on Saturdays… You have your own work and life and you decide when is your best moment to think about the holy things," he says.

He describes parties as holy moments, as in times of reflection and connection with others and with "your other self" – you can become the person you want to be without the restrictions you face at work or during other parts of life.

"It's not just a place for escaping reality – it's much more," he says.

Although Dujov's music isn't necessarily religious, he says his faith does come through in his songwriting.

"I don't want to be like a priest trying to spread religion, but I think religion can be a way of life," he says. "I write about religion, politics, I write about love and family and things that happen in my life. I don't write specific things about religion, but it's all over."

Dujov says he hopes Torontonians will enjoy the party the live show creates.

"If you want just the sounds, you can buy a CD, but if you're at a show, it should be a moment for your senses," he says.

He hopes people will hear his music and that it will make them happy.

"Our cultures were inspired by happiness," he says. "If you keep on being inspired by happiness and not by hate, we can do much better things."

Lauren Kramer

Over the past 25 years, I've been no stranger to Weight Watchers. When my 10 extra pounds have felt like an insurmountable burden, I'd present my credit card, walk away with another little booklet and show up for weekly weigh-ins at various church halls. It would alleviate my conscience, somewhat, and make me feel that, if nothing else, at least I was on the road to a thinner me.

Each time, as I'd join the long line of women awaiting caloric judgment after a week's worth of battling food cravings, the scene would be the same. Those around me would range from reed-thin to normal-weighted women, with occasionally a few obese or visibly overweight ladies among them.

A gasp of distress would come from the digital scale and all eyes would be riveted on the woman poised on top of it. She'd be shaking her head, clearly distressed at this week's number.

"Yes dearie," the Weight Watchers employee behind the counter would say as she recorded the evidence.

"You gained two pounds. Sorry," she'd add, sounding anything but sorry.

This is the world of Weight Watchers, where food is measured in points and distinguished by numeric values rather than by flavour, texture or taste. This is the home of the woman laden with weight complexes, the person beaten by the social yardstick of sexual appeal into believing that she's fat.

Deep down, she suspects everyone, from her friends to her lovers, will like her more if she robs her body of its excess baggage, replacing fatty rolls with bone-baring skin. It's what keeps Weight Watchers in business, really – women on their never-ending quest for the perfect number on the scale, the number that will say, unequivocally, "You're thin, and you're gorgeous!"

Recently, I reached the perfect number, the one I'd been striving toward for years. It was no thanks to Weight Watchers, with whom I parted amicable company several years back. Dr. Pierre Dukan, the famous, in-vogue French Jewish doctor, helped me get there this time, encouraging me with examples from his book, The Dukan Diet.

I'd been certain that when I reached my perfect number, my body issues would be gone and that I'd look in the mirror with pride rather than disdain and criticism. Yet the moment of victory was anti-climactic to say the least. The scale clearly stated that I'd reached my goal, but the bathroom mirror said otherwise.

"Look at those bulges," it leered, deprecatingly. "Maybe it's time for a new perfect number, 10 pounds lower."

The notion of a perfect number is so tempting. When you're far from it, it gives you a goal that can make it worth foregoing dessert or doing that extra set of jumping jacks. Maybe the fun is in the journey toward the goal, and not the arrival, after all.

But a little voice in my head argues that there's no such thing as a perfect number. "It's about accepting you as you," it declares. "Surely you knew that all along?"

BREAKFAST ON THE GO

3 eggs
½ c milk
½ c sugar
1 tbsp vanilla extract
1 tsp cinnamon
10 slices challah cubed,
1 c mixed berries (fresh or frozen)
2 tbsp maple syrup

In a bowl, whisk together eggs, milk, sugar, vanilla and cinnamon until well combined. Add cubed bread; toss gently until egg mixture is absorbed. Add berries; toss gently to combine. Refrigerate a few hours or overnight to allow bread to absorb liquid.

Divide muffin mixture evenly into greased muffin tins and drizzle with maple syrup. Bake in preheated 375° oven for 25 min. Serve warm. These freeze very well –to reheat, place in microwave on defrost for 1 min. Drizzle warm muffins with more maple syrup if desired.

Author's stories look at human frailties, strengths

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

Journalist Fran Edelstein takes readers on an emotional voyage and through a variety of cultures in Set to Music and Other Stories, her first work of fiction.

The seven stories in this book explore many themes and feature a kaleidoscope of countries. Edelstein includes characters of various ages and families who live at various socio-economic levels. Her characters experience both love and loss, and the stories offer insights into human strengths and frailties.

"The book is the fruit of many encounters with people and places that have profoundly affected me, all marinated in a good dose of imagination, fantasy, humour and reflection," Edelstein says.

Edelstein, an octogenarian, was born in Montreal and raised in Toronto in the height of the Depression.

She says that she wanted to be a writer, but her financial situation forced her to get a paying job with the government.

"I always left bits of paper around the house scribbled with ideas and remembrances as they came to me."

At age 42, she attended creative writing classes at Ryerson Polytechnical Institute (now Ryerson University). It was then that she wrote her first short story, The Mantilla, which is included in the book.

The story begins in Mexico and reaches into the lives of a group of diverse individuals. It is the mantilla that binds them all together.

Edelstein, a freelance journalist, has been published in the Canadian Antique Showcase, and she had a monthly column in Canadian Coin and Stamp News. Her feature articles have also been published in the Toronto Star, the Toronto Sun and the London Free Press.

A great-grandmother, Edelstein says she is passionate about storytelling. "I love my thesaurus, but I love people best."

The title story, Set to Music, tells of a young piano virtuoso who is faced with overwhelming obstacles that require choices or the absence of choices. Anne is losing her sight because of a fall from her beloved horse. It is a love story that stirs the emotions.

Deedu is written through the eyes and with the language of a four-year-old boy. The child is fascinated with words. Deedu is the story of love between the young boy, an old man and a little girl, as well as about the choices that the boy makes.

Edelstein's themes are challenging. In other stories, she writes about marriage, survivors and a nurse locked in a hospital cooler with the body of a killer.

Edelstein says she is currently writing her first novel, which will reintroduce one of the characters in the lead story of Set to Music and Other Stories.

"I won't tell you what it is about," she says. "It will spoil the surprise. I'll just say that through music and the arts, for all nations of the world, is where peace might be found."

Set to Music and Other Stories (iUniverse, Inc. Bloomington) can be ordered through www.amazon.com or through a bookstore. It's also available at the Toronto Public Library. For more information, visit www.franedelstein.com.

Brides

We met for lunch and stayed for life

Dorry Korn
Special to The CJN

Coming up this July 3, we will be celebrating our special 25th wedding anniversary. Our marriage took place at Temple Sinai. Our officiating rabbi was Jordan Pearlson of blessed memory. We lovingly called him our "SPA," which stood for our spiritual advisor. He not only was our teacher/mentor, held in the highest esteem, we were also fortunate to have him as a dear friend and loving family member.

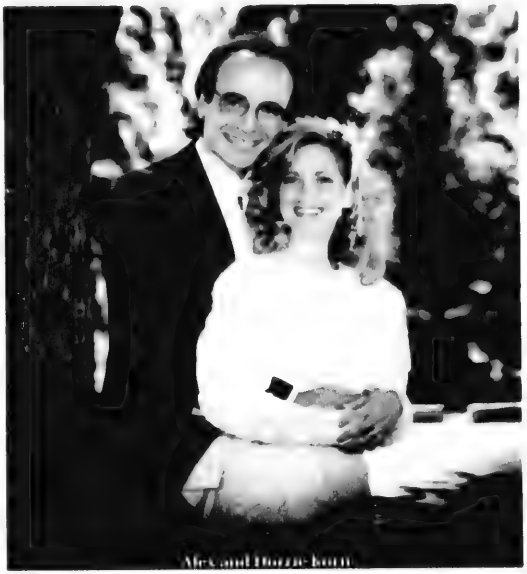
Alex Korn, I have had the time of my life and I owe it all to you. You came into my life when I was a single parent with two girls and a boy. Our mutual friend, Bill Robinson, was the driving force behind our meeting. From the first phone call, there was an ease of conversation. The humour was ever-present, and I was eagerly anticipating talking in person on our first date.

You arrived at my front door that day, all 6-foot-1 of you. My daughter, Reesa, was home, and her eyes were checking you out and assessing Mom's date. The big smile on her face said it all, and off we went on our great adventure, on Dec. 5, 1987. We went to dinner, and afterward we went to a dance club.

It was a chilly night and we simultaneously buttoned up each other's coat collars. Kindness and consideration were there from the outset.

Three days later, it was my 42nd birthday, and you sent a bouquet of roses. The next day, in spite of us saying we would only be friends, we fell in love.

Having spent the day together at what turned out to be an all-day lunch, we found out that we felt at home in each other's presence, sharing deep personal life stories and opening up to each other as never before, totally trusting one another. The time passed in the blink of an eye.



Alex and Dorrie Korn

God and His/Her angels were working overtime by bringing us together. We became engaged that evening.

We came for lunch and stayed for life.

Alex has two boys and a girl, so between us, we have three sons and three daughters. We had a marvelous wedding. Our kids marched down the aisle looking ever so beautiful. Our dear mothers, of blessed memory, looked so radiantly happy knowing that their kids had found their basherts.

This union and blending of our two families has brought us much naches. Our children are married, and it's so wondrous watching them parent their children. Our treasures, our grandchildren, have given us our dearest names: Bubbie and Zaida, Bubster, and Bubs and Z. Our hearts are overflowing with joy and gratitude. L'chaim!

Your wedding day won't be perfect, but so what?

Chloe Korenblum
Special to The CJN

Whoever depicts a wedding as a perfect, happily-ever-after fairy tale has obviously never tried to organize one.

It's a day as real as any other, and as unpredictable and as flawed as the next.

Although my wedding took place on a beautiful sunny summer day, it was anything but smooth.

With no sign of my makeup artist a mere few hours before the ceremony, I started off my wedding day in a panic, phoning every salon in the area, trying desperately to get a last-minute appointment.

She ended up arriving two hours late (what a relief!), and when I rushed into the synagogue, picture-ready and – amazingly – only 30 minutes behind schedule, we were told that our ketubah (as unbelievable as it sounds) was written backwards and would need to be redone.

Just when we thought nothing else could go wrong, in that beautiful moment under the chupah as Henry placed the ring on my finger, my mother's cellphone started going off!

Since it was a new phone, it took her at least a minute to find the volume button, during which time the rabbi politely advised her that unless it was a call from God, she should probably not answer it.

Chloe and Henry Korenblum

Minutes later, one of the bridesmaids nearly fainted and had to be escorted out of the chapel. Some say she was overwhelmed by the intensity and beauty of the ceremony, but others say she probably shouldn't have skipped breakfast that morning.

In the end, we made it to the moment we had all been waiting for: a crash of a glass and the kiss. Home free!

As we walked back down the aisle, a smile plastered on my face, all I could think was, "This is the most incredible and happy day of my life." Not one part of me was thinking about the silly imperfections. The love and joy of sharing this day with my husband and our families overpowered it all.

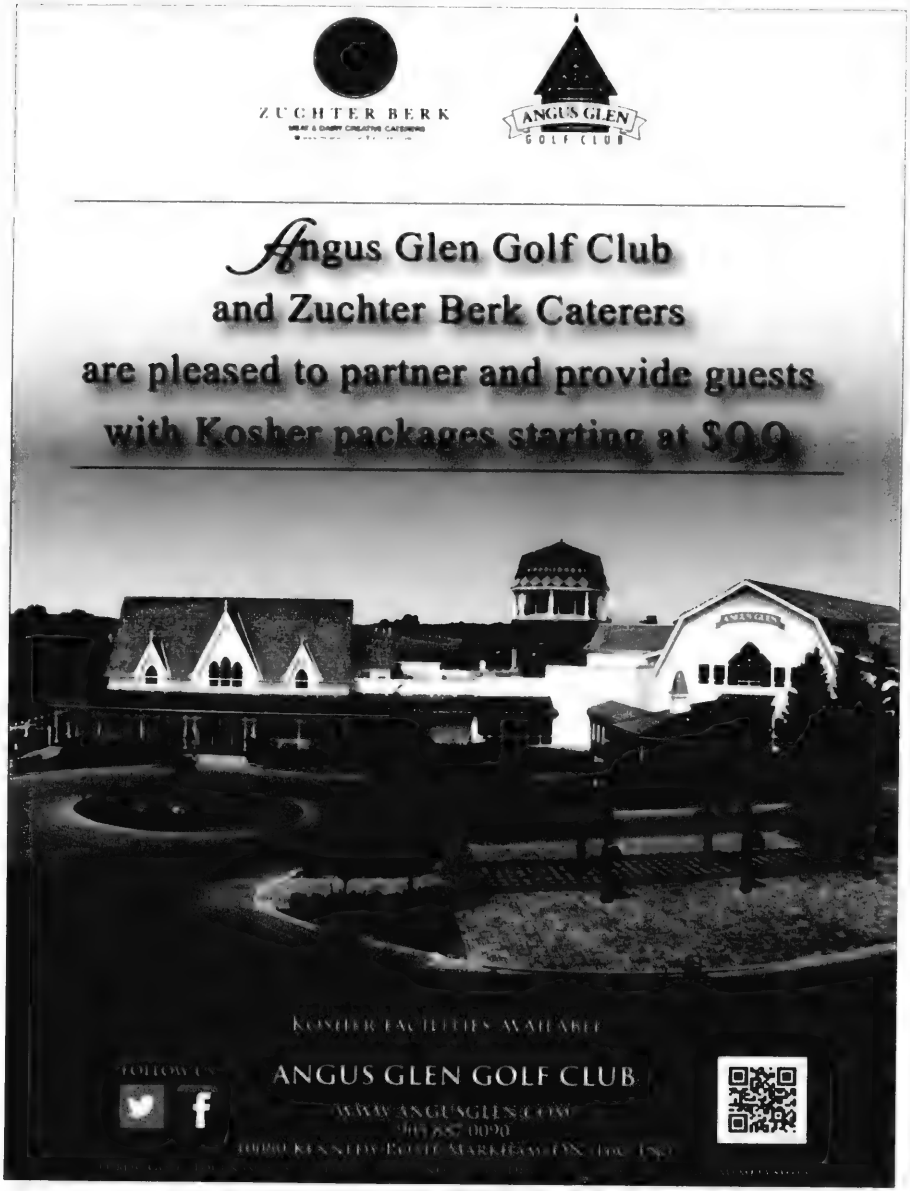
I already look back and chuckle when I think of the moment where I am 90 per cent sure I heard my mother swear out loud in the chapel while fumbling awkwardly with her phone.

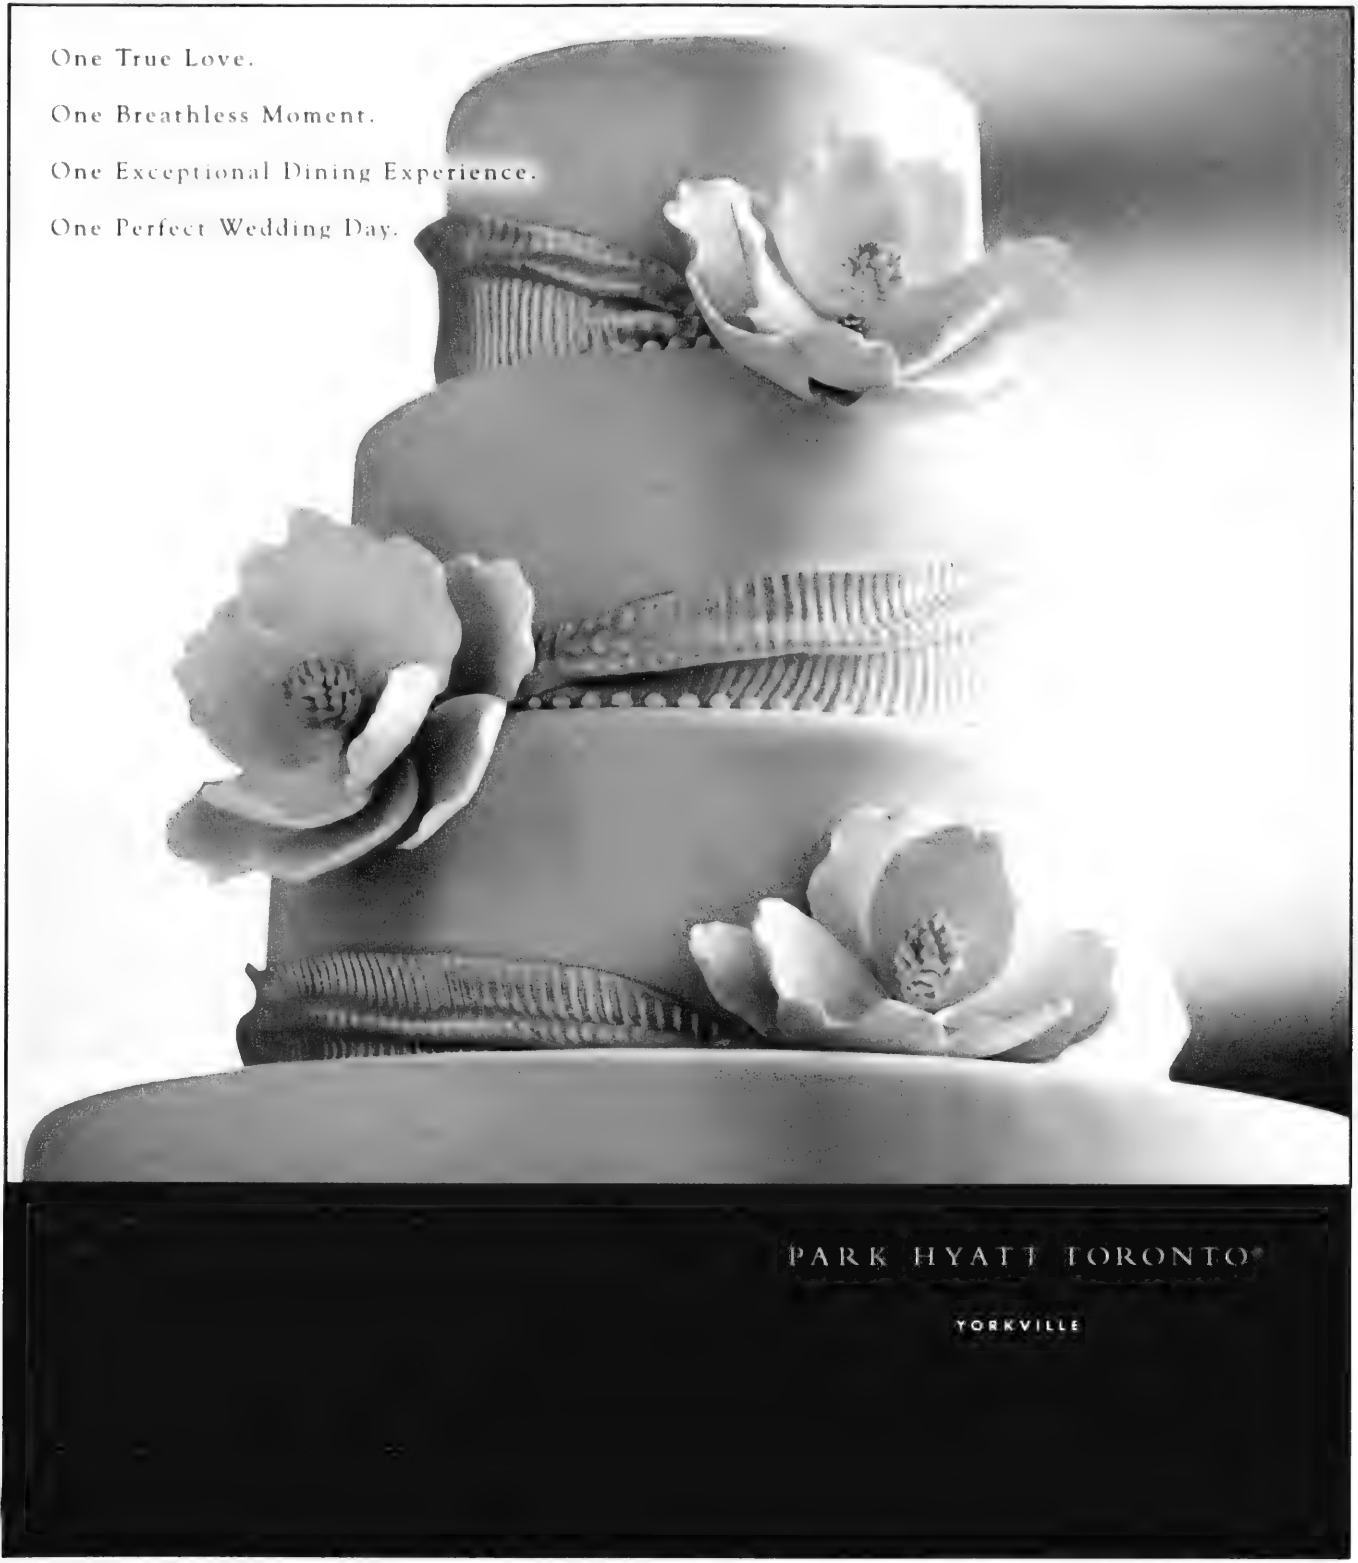
As much as our wedding was a beautiful moment between Henry and me, it was, above all, a day shared and created by our family and friends.

They say it takes a village to raise a child. Well, the same certainly applies to weddings. Not one part of our wedding would have happened without the time, effort and creativity of our loved ones. It was a day planned, built and nurtured by many.

So if you are in the process of organizing your wedding, don't be devastated if it doesn't go exactly according to plan. In fact, I can pretty well promise you that it won't be perfect. But neither is the person you are marrying, neither are your families, and neither are your friends.

It is the total package – the amazing, the unpredictable, the touching and the hilarious – that make a wedding day, as it turned out for us, the happiest day of our lives.





One True Love.
One Breathless Moment.
One Exceptional Dining Experience.
One Perfect Wedding Day.

Fifty years together across Canada

Gail Cooper
Special to The CJN

My parents, Sylvia (Macklis) and Frank White, celebrated their 50th wedding anniversary this past December, exemplifying for their children, grandchildren and everyone who knows them, a true, loving and long-lasting relationship.

Originally from Edenbridge, Sask., and raised on a farm with his two brothers, Frank excelled academically. After graduating as a teacher, he took a trip west to visit family in Vancouver.

Sylvia Macklis grew up with two sisters in Winnipeg's famous North End, graduating from the infamous St. John's Tech. After high school and a brief stint in the work force, Sylvia moved to Vancouver and lived with cousins.

Frank and Sylvia met in Vancouver on a blind date arranged by their relatives. They married on Dec. 24, 1962, in Winnipeg, surrounded by family and friends, and they settled there. Frank was a high school science teacher for 30 years at Stonewall Collegiate, in Stonewall, (30 minutes outside of Winnipeg), and Sylvia stayed home to raise their three children: Gail, Lorne and Ron.

All three children graduated from Winnipeg's I.L. Peretz Elementary School, where they studied Yiddish and Hebrew and strengthened their Jewish identity, culture and heritage. These values were reinforced at home with large family dinners for holidays and simchahs, a tradition that continues to this day. Sylvia and Frank instilled in their children a value for education and a good work ethic. All three children continued on to higher education and successful careers.

Sylvia was the ultimate mother and housewife. There was a home-cooked meal on the table every night, she packed lunches with love and sewed clothes and costumes for her children. She not only effectively managed a busy household, she also found time to learn to swim later in life and became a swim instructor for many years. Later, when the kids were older, Sylvia co-founded and operated a successful travelling ladies clothing and fashion show business for seniors.

Wonderful family memories include annual summer camping trips in a "deluxe" pop-up tent trailer. Over the years, the White family drove west to Vancouver, east to Quebec and west to California, camping everywhere in between.

Frank was also a devoted coach of his daughter's softball team for many years.

Gail, Lorne and Ron all moved from Winnipeg to Toronto, beginning in 1989. Whenever Frank and Sylvia visited Toronto, the three "kids" received the best of all care packages, filled with Sylvia's baking and cooking, and looked forward to Frank's handiwork since he fixed and repaired things while he was in town.

Sylvia and Frank White

Frank and Sylvia finally moved to Toronto to be with their children and granddaughters in October 2010.

They have been busy retirees and volunteers for the last 20 years. In 2003, Frank was the recipient of a Winnipeg Shem Tov Award presented by the federation on behalf of the Gwen Sector Creative Living Centre for his many years of wide-ranging volunteer service.

Now in Toronto, they find there is not enough time to do everything that's offered in the community. They are able to attend all their granddaughters' activities, recitals and ceremonies celebrating their achievements. They have reconnected with former Winnipeggers and have made many new Toronto friends. As was the case in Winnipeg, whenever you call them now in Toronto, they are never home!

For 50 years, their love has never wavered. Sylvia and Frank are doting grandparents to Jennifer and Alison, wonderful and helpful parents and truly best friends.

My cousin's magical Jewish Greek wedding

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

A small, eclectic group of guests, a picturesque setting on the Sea of Crete and, unobjectively speaking, a bit of magic – were among the memorable elements of my cousin Joe's wedding to his bride, Ariana, four months ago.

It didn't take long for my husband, my daughter and me to realize why Joe and Ariana, both Americans, had told us in a save-the-date email that the town of Hania – a 50-minute flight from Athens, and the city where he had proposed – might be the best place in the world. Our taxi from the airport let us off just outside the old town, where our hotel, the Doge, was located on a pedestrian thoroughfare in the city's former Jewish quarter, a short walk from Hania's 14th-century Venetian port.

We entered Kondylaki Street under a lush canopy of bougainvillea, pulling our suitcases along the cobblestone road. On the short walk to our hotel we passed shops housed in centuries-old buildings. Their wares spilled out onto the street – a treasure trove of jewelry, olive oil, local honey, pashminas, postcards, soaps, ceramics, spices and Greek mountain tea.

To our right we saw the Ela taverna, a former soap factory built by Jews in 1650. Across the way, on our left, a sign pointed toward the 15th-century Etz Hayyim Synagogue where the wedding would take place.

Another sign advertised a restaurant called ToXani, where we would eat dinner later that night – a multi-course feast put together by the genial owner. It was our introduction to Cretan cuisine, including my new favourite, fennel pie, and – to end the meal – Raki, a highly alcoholic grape-based spirit that's a local specialty.

Before the wedding, we stopped in to see the synagogue. Originally a Venetian Catholic church, it was given to the Jewish community by the Ottomans when they took over Crete in the 16th century.

We were charmed by the open-air treed courtyard paved with pebbles, and by the arched walls and carved dark wood in the sanctuary. Rabbinic graves and an ancient mikvah beyond the sanctuary underscored the building's history. Sadly, the Jews who remained in Hania in 1944 perished en route to Auschwitz. The community had been among the oldest in Europe, dating back 2,400 years, according to the synagogue website (etz-hayyim-hania.org).

Four days after the wedding, we returned to Etz Hayyim for a Friday night service and partook of hearty challah filled with seeds, nuts and fruit. It was baked by Nicholas Stavroulakis, the synagogue's director, who officiated at Joe and Ariana's wedding. The founder and former director of the Jewish Museum of Greece in Athens, Stavroulakis was the driving force behind the restoration of the synagogue in the late 1990s.

The nuptials – a rare event for a town with a Jewish population of less than 10 – were featured on local television news.

Joe and Ariana pose for pictures at the harbour.

On the afternoon of the wedding, a glorious October day, Joe, Ariana and some 30 wedding guests walked a few blocks to the harbour for picture-taking, led by a quintet of pied pipers – Ariana's two brothers, L.A.-based musicians who have their own group, and three of their musician friends, one American and two from Europe.

The night before the wedding, at a restaurant overlooking the harbour, we danced spontaneously as the five musicians played. It was like a scene from a movie.

By coincidence, shortly before the wedding, a real movie was filmed in Hania. In early October, actors Viggo Mortensen and Kirsten Dunst were in town to shoot The Two Faces of January, a thriller expected to be released in December of this year.

While Joe and Ariana's wedding was a more modest production, it didn't go unnoticed.

My daughter and two cousins were late for picture-taking, and had to ask for directions more than once. "Wedding? That way. Five minutes ago," they were told.

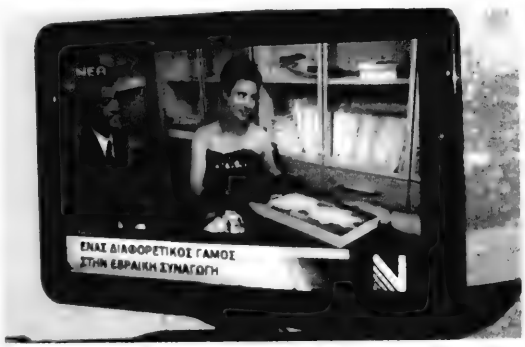
As we walked through the labyrinth of streets and alleys from the hotel to the harbour and back, merchants greeted us from their doorways, and residents took pictures from apartment balconies.

After the formal pictures, which Joe had arranged with a photographer he found online, we headed back to the hotel for a drink before returning to the shul, about a one-minute walk away.

Earlier in the day, my husband and I had accompanied Joe's mother to search for plastic champagne flutes and other last-minute items. It seemed miraculous when we finally found the glasses at a tiny store so packed with merchandise that there was only a narrow path in the middle for customers.

"When I think back on the wedding," Joe told me recently, "I think about how little we planned in advance, and how it all came together so perfectly. I feel blessed."

The wedding – enhanced by a silk chupah hand-painted by Ariana's mother – was very casual, compared to a typical synagogue wedding in North America. Joe and Ariana were dressed formally, in tuxedo and gown, but Stavroulakis wore blue jeans and sat in the pews with us before the ceremony began, talking about Jewish weddings and recounting local Jewish history. He wanted us to feel like a community before the wedding began, he said.



The wedding was featured on the local news.

Guests included staff members from our hotel, people affiliated with the synagogue, and close friends and relatives from the United States and Canada. We ranged in age from under a year to septuagenarian, but somehow meshed pretty quickly in the two days before the wedding, getting to know each other over leisurely al fresco meals – breakfasts at the hotel and long dinners at the end of the day.

In what seemed to us like a Greek touch, Joe and Ariana wore floral wreaths linked to each other by a long ribbon. But Stavroulakis said the wreaths were an ancient Jewish wedding tradition that has been discontinued.

The musicians began to play as soon as Joe broke the glass, and we danced horas in the sanctuary before proceeding to the courtyard to drink champagne and nibble on green and black olives, tomatoes, cucumber and cheese.

Eventually we made our way to Tamam Restaurant, a former Turkish bathhouse, where we had another multi-course feast. Music and dancing made for a lively celebration, and a multitude of toasts added sweetness, good karma, much laughter, and a tear or two.

The next few days, for us, included beach time, a visit to Hania's hundred-year-old market, and a couple of excursions – one to the Palace of Knossos, a Minoan archeological site, and Heraklion, the capital of Crete; and the other to hike the Samaria Gorge, a scenic but challenging 18-kilometre descent. As well, we tried the vegetarian restaurant to Stachi, where we were treated to owner Stelios' kitchen wisdom along with delicacies like chestnuts and onions, and eggplants with pine nuts and raisins.

Joe and Ariana left the day after their wedding to drive around the island, but ended up returning to Hania sooner than planned, drawn again by its magnetic pull.

Couple renews their vows after 45 years

Carolyn and Daniel Kayfetz

Vicky Toblanah,
Special to the CJN

It was the summer of 1958 in Jackson's Point, Ont., when 12-year-old Carolyn Gelman was learning how to swim. She perfected the breast stroke but never managed to dive, bellyflopping when she caught the eye of Daniel Kayfetz, a 14-year-old swim instructor.

"I didn't teach her, but I saw she was the best in the class," says Daniel, now 69. That was the first time the two Toronto natives met – and the beginning of their long life together.

"Who knew about a relationship when you're 12?" says Carol, now Kayfetz, 66. But the friendship quickly blossomed.

"On our first real date, we went to a friend of mine's sweet sixteen party. She wore a gown and she had her hair done up," says Daniel. "My first high-heel shoes," Carol adds.

"My father drove us and picked us up. It feels like only yesterday," says Daniel, as they turn to look at each other.

More than 45 years have gone by, and they're still best friends. "A lot of people grew apart, we grew up together," says Daniel. "Not a lot of people are that lucky."

As a child, Carol worked at her mother's bakery. When Daniel would come in, Carol's mother would always give him a chocolate donut.

"My mom really liked Danny. It was either him, the milkman or the bread man, and I chose Danny," says Carol.

They got married on Oct. 15, 1967, in Toronto.

'We've never looked back'

"When I marched down the aisle, I was 100 per cent sure I was doing the right thing," says Carol. "We've never looked back. In all the years I've known Danny, he, to this day, treats me like a princess and always boasts that I'm the prettiest girl at the party. He says it all the time."

The late Rabbi David Monson performed their wedding ceremony. During World War II, Rabbi Monson fought alongside Davey Kayfetz, Daniel's father. When Davey showed the rabbi a picture of his son Daniel, the rabbi said, "With God's help, I will perform his wedding ceremony when the good time comes," Carol recalls. He delivered on his promise.

They married while Daniel was still in law school, so they didn't have much to their name. They lived with his parents for a few years until they had saved enough money to buy their own house. "The total amount we got as presents was $1,200," says Daniel. "Four of our friends chipped in and got us a kitchen table and chairs, which we still have today. I can't think of anything we had that was new." "The crystals," Carol chimes in.

In 1969, they bought a home in Toronto for $13,000. Taxes were only $24 for the entire year. "I took a month off. I gutted the house. With these two hands," says Daniel, as Carol lifts his hands in the air. That's how they started out.

"My mother gave me a start by giving us a place to live. My wife gave me a start by giving me love," Daniel says as he reaches for his wife's hand, staring at their intertwined hands.

And although time has passed since their days of living in their parents' basement, trying to make ends meet, their relationship itself has not changed. They're still best friends who do everything together, says Carol.

So nothing was more fitting than a surprise vow renewal ceremony for a couple still in love, which their children planned for their 45th wedding anniversary last October.

"They told us we were all going out to a restaurant, to wait upstairs, and they'll let us know when to come downstairs," says Daniel. When they came downstairs, their close family and friends were waiting. But that's not all. Their kids planned it so that every few minutes, a new friend or family member would walk in the front hall, and the couple would be surprised all over again. "It was like a circus, when all the clowns keep getting out of the car," says Daniel. "We kept wondering who's next."

Their children handed Carol a bouquet of roses. And it was the perfect celebration for a couple that had gone through a lot.

In February 1995, Carol had open-heart surgery. Although successful, her heart stopped a couple of hours after the surgery. "The surgeon could not start it. He opened her chest and massaged her heart by hand for six hours. He would not declare her dead," recalls Daniel. The doctor said she was too young and healthy to die, so he tried to keep her alive by using a ventilator, but her heart was still not beating. Ten days later, her heart gave its first beat. Although it was a good sign, her legs needed to be amputated from losing blood circulation for so long. She spent three months in a coma before waking up.

"Then one day she started breathing, one day she moved and then one day she woke up," says Daniel. "That day, the surgeon told me for the first time, not one person in medical history in the entire world has ever lived without their heart beating."

That near-death experience taught them to celebrate everything. "We have very large parties," says Danny. "You gotta count your blessings."

That's also their secret to a lasting marriage. "You close your eyes, and you make concessions on everything. You can always come to a middle ground," says Danny, unless, of course, they're discussing which tie he's going to wear that day.

"Our biggest fight is when I say you're not going out wearing that tie. Were you sleeping when you put on that tie? Everything else besides the colour of the tie is negotiable," says Carol, laughing.

Carol starts scrolling through pictures of their vow renewal ceremony, as Daniel begins playing with her red, curly hair. "There's a picture of us kissing," says Carol. "It's a nice kiss."

It's getting late and the couple – who spend a few months of the year in Florida – need to get ready for their evening activity. "We're gonna go for our swim," says Carol. Fifty years since they first met, they're still swimming together.

The ice storm wedding

Lynn Etinson

Talk about a strange irony. We were told about all kinds of superstitions prior to our engagement – but who would have thought so many of them would come true?

They say that for any bad luck that nature brings you before your wedding, you will have 10 times the good luck for the marriage. Well, we sure felt the luck. We had been dating for almost six years, and had actually been neighbours for 20.

We met at the party of a common friend in 1992 and started talking and laughing, and we did not want to be apart. We became great friends so quickly and – here comes the irony – not only was it raining that night, but after we went our separate ways to go home, I decided to walk our family dog as usual, but stopped for minute in front of Kenny's house.

He wasn't there, but when I returned home, who was sitting on my steps but Kenny? It was the beginning of a beautiful friendship.

We got engaged 5-1/2 years later on an isolated lake in Pennsylvania, where I was working for the month. It was the happiest moment of our lives and the start of the one of the biggest waves in the history of natural and other disasters.

We weren't totally crazy in scheduling a wedding in Montreal in January. There were reasons – my sister Lisa was living in India at the time, and it was the best time for her to come. And we planned to get married on a Saturday night so that people could stay and party as late as they wanted.

It was all easy at first, as we are both very close to our families. Our mothers, Gayle Garfinkle and Janie Etinson, agreed on everything, and our fathers, Robert Garfinkle and Mike Etinson, naturally followed suit.

We stayed a bit out of it in order to avoid any chaos, but that's when forces beyond our control stepped in and decided to take over.

Our invitations were to go out in early November, and they were ready and gorgeous. The post office, however, went on strike. We're pretty sure it wasn't personal, but who knows?

This was the first hump to get over. So, we got into our cars and hand-delivered all the local invitations, then drove to the U.S border to mail them to our American friends. We had our out-of-Montreal friends deliver them in their respective Canadian cities. Luckily, the strike ended, and we were able to receive the replies. Practically everyone was coming – but so was the ice storm.

As the wedding approached, the weather got worse. We were getting married at the peak of the storm. But positive attitudes prevailed, and we all took it with a grain of salt, literally.

Five days before the wedding, I got a call from the dressmaker whose power was off, and she was not sure how she was going to finish my dress. My heart skipped a beat, and my eldest sister, Cory, called her up, worked some magic and said we would be there on Wednesday.

We got there, and I tried on the dress by candlelight, and it was beautiful. That same night, friends kept calling to say they were not sure they would be able to make it into town, as all the airports were closing.

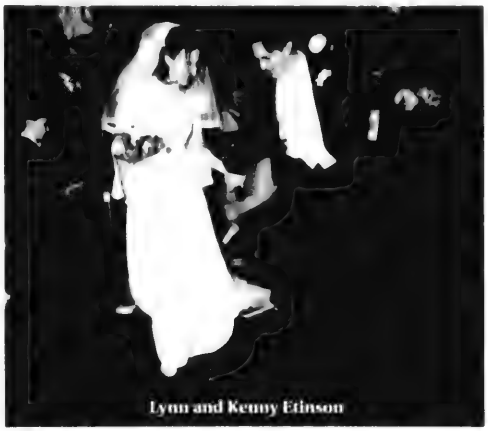
My mother tried to hide her tears, but we were all getting a little nervous. Not to mention that both of our parents' houses lost power, as did the synagogue and the hotel where we were to take our pictures before the ceremony. It was getting scary! For some reason, our apartment never lost power, even though all the buildings around us had done so – someone was looking out for us.

Our rehearsal was to take place at the synagogue Thursday night with a party afterward at my parents' house. The synagogue somehow got power for three hours just at the time we needed it. Of course, most of the bridesmaids and ushers were in transit, but we did it anyway since our siblings, Cory and Lisa Garfinkle, Ryan, Elan, Adam and Neil Etinson were willing to double as the whole bridal party.

The dinner ended up at the house of some family friends, Harriet and Marty Kimmel, and their home became the main shower, sleeping and party spot for our families from then on. That was when our closest friends really shone. This family hosted everything and catered to our every need.

We had friends driving for nine hours to make it in from all over the United States and Canada. People were on the phone with the airlines to get our friends and family into town. It was a true miracle that in all the turbulence, we all got closer.

The night before the wedding, Kenny and I had to sleep in our apartment. We had thought we would be a little traditional by having me stay with my parents the night before the wedding, but we ended up having friends stay with us, and our families had to stay with friends. As we went to bed in a bit of panic, Kenny turned to me and said, "Lynn, all that really matters is that we get to spend the rest of our lives together, whether by candlelight or generator, that's all that counts."



Lynn and Kenny Etinson

I knew then that the next day was going to be perfect.

I woke up in the morning and headed out with my dad to get ready. Kenny, trying to respect my desire to not see each other on the day of the wedding, kept his eyes shut and talked to me through our friends.

When I got outside, the rain had finally stopped and I noticed Kenny's car was gone. It had been towed, and he spent his first waking hours searching for his car, laughing at our luck.

After chasing down the tow truck, Kenny was directed to his car, which had been towed two blocks away. There was no fine, only a note saying, sorry, but the car had been moved so that they could clean the street.

Naturally, I couldn't get my hair done where I had planned, as they had no power either, so the hairdresser came to us instead.

After that, I headed over to Annie Young's for makeup. Little did we know that CTV would be there, too, to film the lucky "ice storm bride." At least all those who couldn't come in for the wedding got to see me on our big day.

Well, I was as pretty as I was going to be, and Kenny was on his way to the hotel for pictures, so off we went.

As my father and I pulled into the hotel, we were forced to dodge falling ice from the roof and had to park illegally, as there were no spots. I literally carried my dress in over my head. Meanwhile, both Kenny and I were in shock at what was happening in the hotel, which did have power.

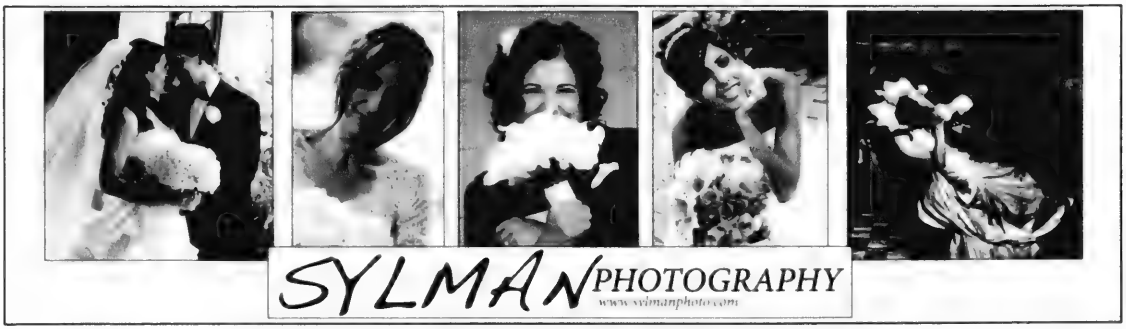
It seemed as if the hotel was the only place in the area with power, as everyone and their pets were walking into the hotel to seek shelter.

Picture this: ladders were being carried up all the stairs to fix the shattered glass, generators were being placed everywhere, dogs were running around this beautiful hotel, and kids played on the floor with their toys.

Still, we kept our smiles on, even with the big, black circles under our eyes, as we knew this was just the beginning of the day, and if we had made it this far, we could continue for another 24 hours.

When we saw each other for the first time, Kenny in his tux and me in my bridal gown, we were both filled with awe and forgot all the craziness. The photo shoot went off without a hitch. OK, maybe one: one of the bridesmaids and one usher ran in after five hours in the car coming from Ottawa, just as we were ready to start the bridal party photos. At least they made it on time, even if they had to brave sleet and snow. Not hail, nor storm, nor postal strike, nor falling ice was going to stop this wedding.

And as promised, there is a happy ending. We have been married for 15 years now, have three beautiful sons ages six, eight and 10, and are living happily ever after.



Family traditions – the ties that bind

Heidi Zackon
Special to The CJN

For Tevye, the iconic "Papa" in Fiddler on the Roof, tradition was all about the roles and expectations for each member of a family. Today, this definition has broadened, as traditions have become uniquely personalized to represent the many ways families come together in both daily life and times of celebration.

"My best memories of childhood are all about the things we did together as a family year after year," Sharon Silver of Montreal says. "Of course, we had the traditions and rituals surrounding the various holidays, but often it was the little things we did on our own that I remember most fondly."

Silver describes setting the holiday table with her brother by pretending they owned a hotel and were preparing for the fancy guests who would arrive. Or, how after a long Passover seder, all the cousins would take turns sitting in their grandfather's big reclining chair and eating special candies out of a crystal dish.

For Silver, 49, everyday things were just as important as holiday rituals, and she reminisces about fresh bagels for Sunday morning brunch, the whole family squishing into the car bundled in ski clothes for a day up north, or roasting marshmallows together after the weekly summer barbecue.

"These memories are of the simplest things, but that's why I appreciate them," she says.

Now, as a parent herself, Silver recognizes how important these little rituals are in bringing her own family together in special ways.

"When my son Michael was younger, we would have a scavenger hunt for his birthday. If he was turning eight, I would place eight little notes in different spots around the house and he would have to find them all throughout the day. It was something he would look forward to each year."

Silver recalls how her older son, Jason, started a birthday tradition when he was six by sharing his favourite cake with his great-grandmother, as their birthdays were just days apart. Now, years later, Silver still bakes the same cake every birthday, making it both a celebration and a special way of remembering a cherished relative.

With her children older now and their lives becoming busier each year, Silver realizes the family's traditions create opportunities to come together and stay connected. This year for Chanukah, they made sure to get together each night even though their schedules had them running in different directions. Silver brought out the family menorah, hand-painted by her son years ago, and they fell into the usual routine of each one alternating turns to light the candles. Afterward, everyone went off again, back to their own lives.

"My boys were the ones who asked what time we would be getting together each night, even without my reminding them. It was just as important to them now too," Silver says. "Even though our time together was short, the feeling of coming together is what mattered. That's what really lasts."

More North American couples are marrying in Israel

Lisë Stern
JNS.org

Picture a wedding in an ancient Roman amphitheatre on the shores of the Mediterranean. Or in the mystical city of Safed, the sun setting over the Galilean Hills. Or in the multi-level garden by the Tower of David in Jerusalem. All these are possible options for destination weddings in Israel, a growing industry.

"It is estimated that there are over 1,000 weddings annually of people from abroad coming to get married in Israel," says Lian Matias, who operates the website Hatunot (www.hatunotblog.com) with Tracey Goldstein. The two-year-old organization, described as "the English speaker's guide to planning a wedding in Israel," acts as a clearing house of details on the wedding industry, with links to planners, venues, photographers and more.

Weddings held by foreigners in Israel differ somewhat from native Israeli weddings, says planner Naomi Tabor, owner of Imagine Weddings in Israel (www.israel-wedding.com). A native of France, she started planning weddings in Israel six years ago when she married an Israeli. Tabor notes that Israeli-style weddings are generally quite different from those of out-of-staters.

"Most Israelis dress down for weddings, while Americans and others dress up. Israelis are very relaxed, with no speeches," she says. "Most of my clients have a more intricate plan, a precise sequence of events. For the meal, most Israelis do a buffet." The sit-down meal approach is now called "American style" in Israel.

And then there's the invitation – because of the nature of the wedding (namely the fact that travel plans are needed), many couples send out invitations or "save the date" notifications six to 12 months in advance – compare to the two weeks' notice or so for Israeli weddings.

Israeli weddings also tend to be huge, with 400 to 600 people and more, and the traditional gift for such nuptials is almost exclusively cash. Destination weddings can be that large, but the average is closer to 150 to 200, and some are as small as 20 to 50.

Nikki Fenton of Bespoke Weddings (www.nikkifenton.com) made aliyah from England in 2007 and has been planning destination weddings in the Jewish homeland ever since. "The energy of weddings in Israel is unexplainable," she says. "Many of the guests are on holiday and have come because they love the couple and their families and the couples chose Israel because they love the country – therefore the energy in the wedding is electric and has a whole lot of soul. I wouldn't want to work on weddings anywhere else because they are so special and beautiful here."

Matias agrees. "Because Israel is so unique and diverse, it abounds in wonderful locations and venues for weddings."

Tel Aviv-Jaffa is the most popular location, followed by Caesarea, Jerusalem, and the Galilee. Venues include hotels, each with their own character. The 24-storey David Intercontinental (www.ichotelsgroup.com) in Tel Aviv is good for larger groups who want the backdrop of modern Tel Aviv.

Outdoor weddings are especially popular

The boutique-style modern-meets ancient Mamilla Hotel (www.mamillahotel.com) outside the walls of the Old City of Jerusalem has a rooftop space and a fashionable elegance.

But hotels and event halls aren't the only options. "Many weddings are held in private homes," says photographer-turned-planner Danny Marx of Danny Marx Ltd. (www.marx.co.il). "We planned an amazing wedding of two days in the desert for a couple from New York. Two hundred guests stayed the night and enjoyed the experience of special desert breakfast and camel tour."

Some weddings may have a theme revolving around the food, a favourite colour or a movie. "I planned a wedding where theme was entirely Alice in Wonderland," Fenton recalls. "We even made the aisle to the chupah multi-coloured stripes to match the theme."

Outdoor weddings in Israel are especially popular, in deserts, by the water (Red Sea, Dead Sea, Mediterranean, Lake Tiberias), on farms, at vineyards or in forests. "You absolutely know from May to September you're not going to have rain," says Tabor. "You can choose your dates in peace." And if you want a winter wedding, head way south. "It's amazing to get married in Eilat in January – it feels like June or July."

Given the logistics of arranging a wedding from afar, a wedding planner seems almost a necessity, though a wedding can be arranged without one. There are so many components to co-ordinate: venue, menu, drinks, table décor, flowers, band, photographer, ceremony, the rabbi and more. "I think it's very, very hard, aside from it being my business," Tabor says. "One reason that gets overlooked is that I will get better prices than a foreigner who picks up the phone and calls the venue speaking only English – they're going to get the 'tourist' price."

"Planners are highly skilled and experienced people in the wedding field here that will make your wedding day dreams come true and will be able to do all that through long-distance planning," Matias says.

Tabor says the popularity of Israel as a wedding destination has almost tripled since she started.

The cost for a destination wedding has a wide range, but several wedding planners agree that rates start around $200 per person. This includes the location and meals (but not the dress!). Planners may charge a set fee, or 12 to 15 per cent of the cost of the wedding. And couples marrying in Israel do need to apply for an Israeli marriage registration if they want the wedding to be considered valid in Israel. This can be a bureaucratic process. It includes providing documents verifying that both bride and groom are Jewish and single. A good wedding planner helps take care of this, too.

"I know how to do it chik-chak [quickly]. I do it all the time," says Tabor.

Newlyweds renovate 'hideous' house

Ellen Lechter Green
Special to The CJN

When newlyweds Debbie and Michael Newman moved into their early 20th-century "craftsman"-style home three years ago, they were less than charmed by the outdated décor.

"Quite simply, the house was hideous," says Debbie, who co-owns a security company with her husband. "The main floor walls were painted operating-room green, but I knew that would be an easy fix. I realized right away that the house had good bones."

Although the couple were recently married, they were ready to take on a renovation project together. "Michael's family is in construction, and he had hands-on experience with previous renos," says Debbie. "We felt we could tackle this project together."

All the original oak hardwood and window casings, stained-glass windows and the iconic square-posted "arts and crafts" staircase were still in good condition. "It wasn't a complete reno, just a cosmetic one," she says. "I researched the original colours popular for both the design and time period in order to maintain the integrity of the house. I wanted to complement the colour of the medium-brown wood with earth tones."

After one painting error, when the dining room was painted macaroni-and-cheese orange, they settled on butternut yellow with hints of french provincial blue throughout the entire living and dining area and adjoining hall. To address the dark interior, they added recessed lighting in the living room and hallway. However, nothing seemed to brighten up the space.

"The walls were a bright colour, but the rooms remained gloomy. I tried adding cheerful artwork and area rugs, but nothing seemed to work," she says. "After living with it that way for a while, I realized the house badly needed a fresh, modern look."

The couple decided to paint the mouldings and window casings a crisp pure white and the walls ivory. "I had a concept of an urban New York brownstone with dark floors and staircase and light walls with simple splashes of colour from art," she says. "We live in an urban midtown neighbourhood, and I believed the style of the house would lend itself well to the concept. The goal was to keep the charm of the house, while getting rid of its dull tired appearance."The fireplace was also remodelled. The blue bricks and dull wood mantelpiece were replaced with staggered stones in a simple palette of beige and white. "We laid a slab of black granite for the hearth and used recycled wood on the mantel, which was sanded and stained ebony," Debbie says.

The focal point of the living room, which has a remodelled fireplace, is the artwork.

Built-in shelving to match the mantel and to showcase sculptures and art now flank the fireplace. "We're big on collecting art, and I want the art to be the focal point of each room," she adds. "The light tone on the walls plays off against the bold pieces, which was the look I was going for."

The stained- and leaded-glass windows have been put into newly white frames, and furniture has been scaled back in each room for a sleek more minimal design.

The couple, who enjoyed the renovation and decorating process so much together, is next planning to replace their hand-carved Victorian antique dining table, chairs and buffet with something less elaborate.

"The craftsman-style homes were built using simplicity of form, local natural materials and the visibility of handicraft," Debbie says. "The décor of our house is now far more in line with that very ideal."

Niagara Falls a giant pretext in this engagement story

Stephen Sweet
Special to The CJN

It was years in the making and is set to last a lifetime.

After just under three years of dating, Adam Sweet asked Ariela Shvartsman to marry him, and she said yes.

Although Adam had been planning to propose for quite some time, when the moment came, the words didn't quite make it out.

"I opened the box and showed her the ring," said Adam of his engagement in Niagara Falls in mid-December. "Ariela paused for a moment and said, 'Wait, you didn't ask me anything!'

"For fun," Ariela interjected.

"Well, it was part of my plan to figure out what she liked, and didn't like, and put the thought [of getting married one day] in her head," Adam said.

Ariela liked the idea as well, but she didn't want to get engaged while she was still in school.

So, on the night of her final exam, just two days before he proposed, Adam went over to Ariela's house while she was still at school and informed her parents.

On the following Saturday, Adam told her that he had to go to St. Catharines for a work emergency, but that he would have a room booked for them in Niagara Falls.

She took the bus to meet him there.

Adam had already arrived at the hotel, with a dinner for the two (which, though he won't admit it, was made by his mother), and a ring box in his pocket.

She started to wonder what was going on when Adam told her there was no work emergency and that this was more of a congratulations for finishing her final exam.

"I managed to put her suspicions at ease when I told her that I wanted to watch the [Ultimate Fighting Championship] fights that night," Adam said.

"Yeah, the UFC really threw me off," Ariela said.

After dinner, Adam suggested that they go look at the falls, which is something he had never been interested in doing.

"I just thought, OK," Ariela said. "I'm not going to say anything, because I always want to go look at the falls and he never does."

They went to a special area by the falls, and once they were alone, Adam, after some good-natured prodding by Ariela, got the words out to propose.

"I'm a little worried that at the wedding, she's going to try and pull the same thing," Adam said.

"No," Ariela said. "If you ask me, I will answer you."

"Well, the rabbi's going to ask," Adam said. "All I'll have to do is say yes."

"OK," Ariela said. "Then there won't be a problem!"

Adam and Ariela plan to get married on Aug. 5, much to the delight of their parents.

"So then I asked her to marry me."

There was a similar situation early in their relationship, when Adam felt they were ready to date seriously.

"She kept saying, 'Yes, what are you trying to say? Keep going, out with it'," Adam said.

The two of them originally met in high school, but they were just acquaintances until they kept bumping into each other.

"It would be in really random places, where you wouldn't expect to see that person," Ariela said.

They bumped into each other in the student union office at the University of Toronto's Mississauga campus, which surprised Ariela, since Adam wasn't even a student there.

"Then, I saw him driving one time while I was on the bus," said Ariela, who waved until Adam spotted her. The same thing happened a while later, when Adam walked past her work.

They ended up at a few birthday parties of mutual friends, and then, in February 2010, Adam asked Ariela out.

"He did it on Facebook. It was very romantic," said Ariela with a laugh.

The pair became inseparable, and Adam knew very quickly that she was the one he wanted to be with forever.

"We went on our first cruise together after five months of going out," Adam said. "At one of the first islands, I wanted to look at rings, and so she started trying them on."

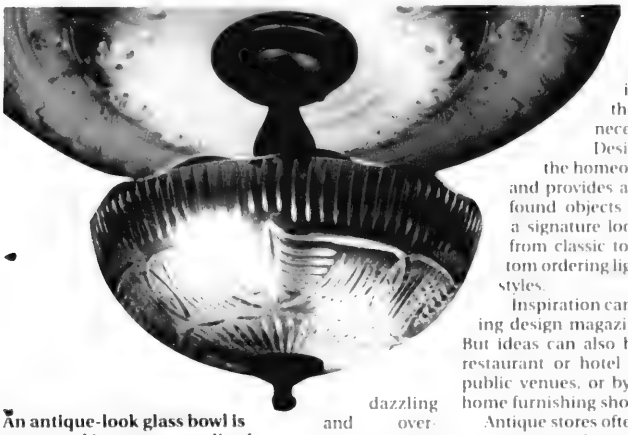
Romantic lighting enhances home decor

Anita Szabadi-Gottesman
Special to The CJN

While furniture, accessories and wall colour set the tone in home decor, effective lighting puts the finishing touches on any room.

The choices available in the marketplace are at once dazzling and overwhelming. A welcome alternative is to get custom-made light fixtures to create a personalized look that complements and enhances any room.



An antique-look glass bowl is converted into a personalized fixture for a front hall.

[Anita Szabadi-Gottesman photos]

We've come a long way from one standing lamp in the corner, and choosing the right type of lighting will completely alter the look and feel of any space. Wall sconces, table lamps, chandeliers and work/study task lighting are just some of the alternative light sources that work together to shine up a home.

The first thing to consider is the amount of natural light that is already present in the room. Using one central light can cast unwanted shadows, and it is therefore essential to plan different light sources for every room.

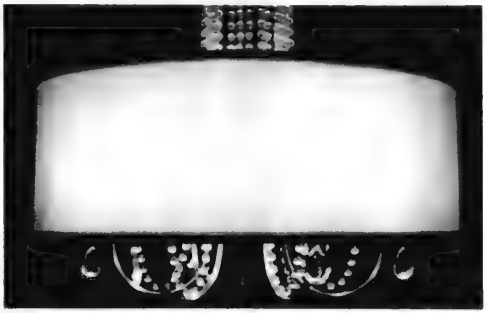
Dark corners come to life with appropriately placed, recessed sconces or wall lighting. Form must meet function, and the next step is establishing the purpose for which each light source will be used. More subdued bedside reading lamps will complement the brighter overhead lighting necessary in dressing areas.

Designing custom lighting allows the homeowner to add a personal touch and provides an opportunity to use unique found objects as the inspiration to create a signature look in the home. Styles range from classic to modern and retro, but custom ordering lighting can combine any number of styles.

Inspiration can come from many sources including design magazines and home renovation shows. But ideas can also be borrowed from your favourite restaurant or hotel lobby decor, museums or other public venues, or by taking a leisurely stroll through home furnishing showrooms.

Antique stores often provide unique options, and the wiring in most lamps can be replaced to meet modern safety standards. Try taking a blown glass vase and having it turned upside down into a one-of-a-kind hanging lamp. The special qualities of blown glass allow it to be crafted in any desired shape, from flared to fluted or cylindrical. Spectacular chandeliers can be designed using various crystals in a rainbow of colours from deep amber to baby blue, or even clear to match or complement any decor. Famed Swarovski crystals can be incorporated into any design. And you can frequently find interesting pieces online or by scouring fairs and antique alleys.

Customized lighting also allows for unique finishes on lighting hardware. Choose any tint, and finish lighting with a satin, antique or high-gloss effect. Topping off the lighting with custom lampshades highlight your custom look.



Custom-made chandelier with hanging crystals and crystal draping and a made-to-order round shade reflects the signature style of the homeowner.

It's important to recognize that you may need help. Working with an interior or lighting designer can ensure that any ideas you have will serve both form and function. An untrained eye will not necessarily get the proportions right. A designer's educated eye and expertise will focus on proper dimensions to ensure that the sought-after effect will be reflected in the finished product. A trained professional will, for example, measure the dining room table and recommend the appropriate size for a fixture that will spread the light evenly for all the diners. Height is also a factor when placing lamps and sconces. Measuring counter heights and adjusting overhead lighting appropriately are important to guarantee correct placement over a work station or kitchen island.

Select the appropriate light bulb to create a glow with old-fashioned incandescent bulbs, or choose brighter, more intense hues with LED (light-emitting diode) bulbs. Look for unique shaped bulbs to add whimsy and style to light fixtures. Install dimmers for an enhanced ambience.

Honeymooners do volunteer work together

Anita Szabadi-Gottesman
Special to The CJN

Couples are adding meaning to the traditional honeymoon voyage by choosing to do volunteer work together as newlyweds.

The Huffington Post, along with other publications and wedding watchers, have been using a newly coined word lately "honeyteering." Rather than relaxing on the beach, more couples are choosing to give back while strengthening their new bond.

Worthwhile projects include building schools in Africa, helping at an orphanage or getting involved with the multitude of other volunteer opportunities in the developing world. Many volunteers assist at environmental cleanups or work with abandoned or injured animals.

Volunteer opportunities exist in Israel, including working on army bases, assisting ambulance technicians from Magen David Adom and fighting fires, to name a few.

Volunteer opportunities also exist closer to home, including for newlyweds who are concerned with local animal protection.

The province of Quebec continues to distinguish itself as the puppy-mill capital of Canada. Provincial authorities raiding long-established puppy mills and illegal backyard breeders are constantly in the news.

The Canadian Federation of Humane Societies, the national voice for humane societies and Canadian branches of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals (SPCA), reports that, in Canada in 2010, 42,000 dogs were picked up from puppy mills or abandoned, along with 90,000 cats. Many thousands of animals had to be euthanized. Just over 50 per cent were adopted, and some were returned to their original owners. The statistics are staggering, especially as municipal shelter statistics are not included in the numbers. More people are choosing to help abandoned animals one dog at a time – to foster, rehabilitate and work toward adoption.

Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals volunteer Debbie Weinberger-Burak cares for former puppy-mill dog, Lizzie, and her five puppies until they are ready for adoption. (Anita Szabadi-Gottesman photo)

Debbie Weinberger-Burak, Agence Ometz family life educator by day and mother of four, has taken up the gauntlet to help animals in need. After volunteering at her local SPCA for several years and seeing the many abandoned animals, Weinberger-Burak recently took her avocation one step further by fostering a young mom, Lizzie, and her five pups. They were seized in one of the biggest puppy-mill raids on record in Quebec. "I am passionate about animals and knew I had to help," Weinberger-Burak says.

Despite having a three-year-old family dog, Weinberger-Burak was undaunted. She brought the new young family to a warm corner of the basement family room of her home. These temporary members of her family had been housed in the E Wing of the SPCA on Jean Talon Street. "If there is a dog that is under stress at the regular shelter or arrives from a puppy mill, he or she is transferred to the E Building, which provides a quieter environment," Weinberger-Burak says. "We are making their living conditions a little more tolerable until they are adopted."

From the most recent puppy-mill dogs housed at the SPCA, some 90 puppies were born. They need hands-on care until they are weaned from their mothers and given health checks and vaccines that prepare them for adoption. "Fostering a mom and her pups is the spirit of tikkun olam at work," says Weinberger-Burak. "My children get to experience first-hand that need and compassion go hand in hand [while] taking this canine family from abuse to love."

The Burak children help with the daily routine of washing and towelling the five puppies, as well as cleaning their cage. They take the time to play with and socialize the puppies and make sure mom is not forgotten – they take her outside for some much-needed playtime.

Weinberger-Burak stresses that anyone can become a volunteer. "You can give as little or as much time as you have," Weinberger-Burak says. Volunteer duties encompass basic care, including walking the animals, feeding them and cleaning their cages. "Much of our work is very unglamorous, but we are making a difference in these animals lives," she says.

Most agencies have a co-ordinator ready to place volunteers according to their interests. Couples looking to honeyteer abroad should consult the agencies directly by phone or email.

Today's brides favour eco-friendly fashions

Elaine Cohen
Supplements Co-ordinator

Brides today have an interest in protecting the environment for future generations. When they plan their wedding, honeymoon and home wardrobe, they often look for sustainable products.

American author Summer Rayne Oakes is a media star, fashion model, eco-friendly consumer activist and entrepreneur. She's also a graduate of Cornell University with degrees in environmental science and entomology.

Her book, Style, Naturally: The Savvy Shopping Guide to Sustainable Fashion and Beauty, is a perfect gift for brides. Distributed by Raincoast Books in Canada, it includes information about and colourful illustrations of clothing, shoes, beauty products, handbags, jewelry and accessories.

Oakes has some excellent tips for brides in this book. The eco-friendly fashion guru offers money-saving tips, healthy hints and style-savvy suggestions. In fact, this tome is for every woman who wants to feel confident that she's looking chic.

Oakes describes herself as an eco-advocate committed to environmental stewardship. She takes her role seriously and is a popular interviewee on talk shows and contributes to online sites. She's not afraid to speak out and tell readers and audiences what's on her mind, and she does praise fashion designers who follow sustainable practices.

Oakes lets readers know that everything they do from applying makeup and styling their hair to zipping jeans and lacing sneakers affects the environment. Ultimately, it influences the health of all inhabitants of the Earth. The good news is it's just as easy to select sustainable eco-friendly cosmetics, clothing and accessories as it is to opt for products that are detrimental to the environment. She also says natural products tend to be economical and equally efficient.

The most successful companies use sustainability as a source of innovation, she says. A good shopper is an "edited" shopper. Instead of grabbing the first pretty purse or fashionable shoe off the shelf, a savvy shopper checks out the product. She also asks herself, "Do I need this?" and "Will I get wear out of it?"

According to the author, a sensible buy may be a scarf or shirt that helps build awareness for breast cancer or products made from materials that don't cause environmental havoc.

Although she doesn't advocate getting rid of entire wardrobes, Oakes does provide hints on how to responsibly clear out unwanted items.

She interviewed Julie Gilhart, the senior vice-president and fashion director of Barneys, N.Y. Gilhart acknowledged that the fashion business is all about trends. Nevertheless, she told the author that she doesn't see the interest in eco-friendly lifestyles and products disappearing.

Love after 50

Ellen Lechter Green
Special to The CJN

Sharon Kleinberg and Sid Stermer are proof that when you're least expecting to find love, you often do.

Although Kleinberg, 54, and Stermer, 60, shared mutual friends for years, they never really got to know each other. Then almost three years ago at a gathering one evening, all that changed. "It was all about the timing," says Kleinberg. "We had known each other for years, but on that particular day we just started to talk. We were two people at the right place at the right time. It was all so easy."

Kleinberg, who works in sales and production for a textile importer, never felt she needed to get married in order to complete her already full and successful life. "I wasn't looking for a partner to fulfil me," says Kleinberg. "And although I had been in other relationships, I never considered getting married before. I preferred to be single than to settle with someone for the wrong reasons."

Kleinberg admits that in her 20s and 30s, her criteria for what she looked for in a partner might have been slightly different than it is today. "The qualities I was looking for in a partner back then were pretty shallow," she says, laughing. "They've changed significantly over the years."

Kindness, friendship and compatibility were topping Kleinberg's list of an ideal partner when she and Stermer finally began dating. "I immediately recognized all those qualities in Sid, along with his generosity of spirit," she says. "He is willing to share his whole life with me as I am with him. What is his is mine and vice versa, so the transition of combining our lives together has been seamless."

The couple honeymooned in Barbados.

Stermer works in commercial real estate and is the father of four children: two adult daughters and 13-year-old twins. "We both went into this relationship without any rose-coloured glasses on," Kleinberg says. "There were never any games or pretentions. We are just two people who were ready to find each other and we did."

And although Kleinberg never thought she'd see herself walking down the aisle as a bride, the couple's formal hotel wedding last summer turned out to be especially poignant and meaningful. "We were surrounded by all the people we care about and who care about us," she says. "We felt very blessed and grateful."

The couple started off married life in the house they share with the twins before setting off for a weeklong honeymoon in Barbados. Since then, they resumed their lives together easily, as has been the case throughout their entire relationship. "It's so true that when you're not looking, you find love," says Kleinberg. "We both consider ourselves very lucky."

Decorate with shades of white

Anita Szabadi-Gottesman
Special to The CJN

Newlyweds today are using a white palette – shades of white – to decorate their homes, creating a look that is far from the sterile and uninspired white rooms of yesteryear.

Known for top-quality indoor and exterior paints, Benjamin Moore carries 151 shades of white in its collection, and big-box do-it-yourself trendsetter Home Depot stocks 175 white hues from a gamut of manufacturers. The tones range from crisp and clean, with whimsical names of seemingly overwhelming choices.

White-on-white pairings in furniture or paint create a signature look for the bride and groom setting up their new home together. [Anita Szabadi-Gottesman photo]

A dizzying array of white options is available in all manner of décor, from sofas in white fabrics and leather to accent tables and curl-up-in chairs. White has seemingly become the ultimate decorating option in urban expression.

Start with white on the walls. White was once considered an uninspired white wash to clean and refresh a room. Today, however, you can choose a white paint shade from a myriad of choices. Scanning any paint manufacturer's white colour palette will illustrate the sheer numbers such as Right White and Llama White, to whites with a hint of grey including Dry Martini and Little White Lie, all from the Glidden paint line. You can mix and match various tones of white on baseboards, ceilings and doors as long as the tones are from the same family.

Lynda Reeves, editor of Canada's House and Homes magazine, suggests choosing a mix of cool blue whites for a modern, crisp-looking home and using warm vintage whites when creating an antique-inspired look. Whatever the final choice, the caveat is to make sure that all the whites stay within the same family – cool whites across the board or warm whites throughout. Mismatching whites from the various families disrupt the natural flow of the room or rooms forming the white landscape. Canada's Style at Home magazine recently dedicated a complete issue to creating a flowing white palette throughout the home.

Whitewashed floors can offset a white dinette set placed on a white shag rug. You can complement the mood of a room with white Roman window treatments, adding a white lampshade to a somewhat tired-looking table or floor lamp and adding some white candles atop the newly gifted candlesticks.

Mixing it up a bit works well with white and is often a sought-after look. Placing white wooden chairs around an antique pine dining table will make not only the table but also the whole room pop with a bit of the unexpected.

Eclectic furniture pairings are de rigeur today, not only allowing for the easy personalization of the home but enabling the bride and groom to mix and match a bit of old and new brought into the marriage. Family heirlooms, often needing some restoration or cleaning, can be painted or stained white by even the least experienced amateur artisan.

Marriage and the name-change debate

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

Months before my wedding I sat down with my parents, in-laws and fiancé and told them my decision: I'd be keeping my maiden name.

Lauren Kramer and Mark Aginsky

There were a few minutes of stunned silence before my dad objected vociferously: "Oh no you're not, young lady!"

I'd known for years that my maiden name was staying put, but 16 years ago, it still seemed like an unusual decision that needed hefty justification.

"What about your kids?" I was asked. "What if the school needs to call you someday and you don't have the same last name as your children?"

I was confident it would all work out. My kids would take my husband's name, and their future schools would not be stymied by our different last names. But I was also saddened that what I perceived as an act of loyalty to my personal identity was being construed as an insult to my husband's family name. I had nothing against his name. I just thought the idea of name-changing itself seemed antiquated and quite absurd. It wasn't a tradition I wanted to follow.

The name-change question remains a touchy subject for some, and one that's reached no firm consensus over the past decade. There was a time when hyphenation was wildly popular and married women were patiently spelling first their maiden name and then their husband's in an attempt to keep everyone happy. It made for some long, complicated surnames and it's not a trend that's remained prominent today.

It's a big decision, changing one's name, says Susan Shapiro Barash, author of The Nine Phases of Marriage (St Martin's Griffin, 2012). "Not changing one's name seems bold, even today," she says, adding that 90 per cent of wives take their husband's name. "In our present culture, a young wife subscribes to what she believes will make her marriage more fluid, thus changing one's name is more common than not."

Still, it's a decision worthy of thought and consideration, especially given the high divorce rate. "Women should consider how much taking one's husband's name is a statement of their commitment to their husbands and of their view of traditional marriage, where this was always the way it was done," Barash says.

It certainly takes some commitment to change your last name. Consider the laborious paperwork involved in informing a myriad of agencies that you have a new name, including banks, credit card companies and drivers' license renewal offices, and changing the information on your lease, mortgage, tax returns and social insurance.

Suzanne Venker, author of How to Choose a Husband and Make Peace with Marriage (WND Books, February 2013), says changing your name makes an important statement about the family unit. "It's silly, impractical and a pain in the butt to keep your maiden name," she insists, adding a caveat for women who've made a significant name for themselves in their careers. None of Venker's friends has kept her maiden name, she says, and when she married 15 years ago, it never occurred to her not to take her husband's name.

Changing your name has nothing to do with losing your identity, she argues. "You can be a traditional wife and mother and still be an independent person, because marriage, in and of itself, doesn't take that away from you. You don't have to keep your maiden name to make a statement. By simply carving out some space for yourself that's separate from your husband and your kids, you can make a statement about your independence."

Barash recalls a time in the 1970s and '80s when keeping one's maiden name was considered very modern and sent a message of independence.

"Now I see a backlash to this, and the millennial bride is more apt to simply conform and take her husband's name," she says.

Still, there are lots of factors involved. How will a name change affect a woman's identity in her workplace, where she's long been associated with her maiden name? And though it's uncool to mention the high divorce rate before a wedding, it's still worthwhile to mull over a "what if?" Do you change your name for marriage and then change it again after a divorce? If you remarry, how many times, exactly, are you required to keep changing your name? And what if, for example, you really don't like your husband's last name?

Whether you change your name is a personal decision for each couple, and Barash says she's interviewed women who are extremely comfortable with changing their last names and those who wrestle with the issue.

In addition, "some husbands become old fashioned about it and request it of their wives," she says.

Clearly, there's no right or wrong way to go here, just a sense of personal comfort and identity that will sway a woman one way or another.

Papal candidate has sought dialogue

Canadian considered a favourite to succeed Benedict XVI

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Quebec's Cardinal Marc Ouellet, considered a leading contender to become the next pope, has shown a sensitivity and openness to the Jewish community in recent years.

In 2006, while archbishop of Quebec City and primate of Canada, Cardinal Ouellet invited a Jewish delegation to his residence to mark the recent 40th anniversary of Nostra Aetate, the historic declaration by the Second Vatican Council modernizing relations between the Roman Catholic Church and non-Christian religions.

The delegation was composed of representatives of Canadian Jewish Congress and the local Jewish community, as well as Rabbi Leigh Lerner of Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom. Then-Israeli consul general in Montreal, Marc Attali, was also included and spoke at the gathering.

"I personally could not have envisioned such a meeting taking place in my youth," then-CJC Quebec region chair Jeffrey Boro said at the time. "Cardinal Ouellet is to be commended for having initiated this remarkable encounter."

The following year, Cardinal Ouellet issued a rare acknowledgement of the church's past "errors," including antisemitism, and asked for forgiveness. Besides its spiritual import, the unusual public statement significantly came in the midst of Quebec's acrimonious debate over the "reasonable accommodation" of religious minorities.

It also came during the year leading up to an important Catholic conclave, the International Eucharistic Congress, that was to be hosted in Quebec City.

Violence returns to West Bank

Palestinians once again have taken to the streets in violent protest against Israel. The man seen here setting the tires alight last Friday is outside the Ofer prison near Jerusalem where four Palestinians, released in the exchange for Gilad Schalit, were incarcerated. More violence was directed at Israel on Monday after a Palestinian prisoner died in custody.

CIJA Visits Israel

TORONTO — A delegation from the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs was in Israel for four days earlier this month for meetings with key Israeli and Palestinian officials. Led by CIJA chair David Koshchitzky, the 22 delegates on the Feb. 10-13 trip met with Yesh Atid leader Yair Lapid and Bayit Yehudi leader Naftali Bennett, as well as senior members of the Likud, Labor and Yisrael Beiteinu parties and the Prime Minister's Office. They also met with Israeli Strategic Affairs Minister Moshe Yaalon, Home Front Defence Minister Avi Dichter and Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz, in addition to Jewish Agency chair Natan Sharansky, journalists, academics, clergy and PA negotiator Mohammed Shtayyeh.

Drabinsky Released

TORONTO — Fallen entertainment mogul Garth Drabinsky was released on day parole earlier this month after serving 17 months in jail for fraud. He had been granted parole in October after serving 13 months in a minimum-security prison in Gravenhurst, Ont., but had to wait for space to open up in Toronto's crowded halfway houses, the Toronto Star reported. The former CEO of the Cineplex Odeon movie theatre chain was convicted in 2011 of fraud related to the 1998 collapse of his Livent live-theatre company. His latest venture, Tiberius Entertainment Group, is reportedly working on a remake of Drabinsky's 1980 horror film, The Changeling.

Historic Book Marks 30th Anniversary

OTTAWA — Toronto-area MP Mark Adler hosted an event this week to honour the 30th anniversary edition of the book None Is Too Many by Irving Abella and Harold Troper.

The event featured speeches by Citizenship and Immigration Minister Jason Kenney and by Abella.

The 1983 book detailed that Canada had the worst record among western countries in admitting Jewish refugees from Nazi Europe between 1933 and 1948.

Irving Abella

"The book None Is Too Many is a significant historical account of Canada's shameful immigration policies during World War II," Adler said. "Unlike the disgraceful policies during the war, the Harper government is now a world leader when it comes to welcoming refugees, combating anti-semitism and promoting Holocaust awareness."

Adler added: "I am proud our country has taken a leading role in Holocaust education efforts and in fighting racism, prejudice and discrimination in all forms."

In addition to the speeches, the Ottawa Jewish Community School choir performed at the event.

WORLD

New Claim Deadline

NEW YORK — Jews who owned property seized by the Nazis in what became East Germany have a last chance to get compensation. For the first time in a decade, the Claims Conference has agreed to review new claims by potential heirs to Jewish-owned property in the former East Germany. On Feb. 19, it announced a fund worth $67 million for eligible heirs. The Late Applicants Fund will be open until Dec. 31, 2014. After German reunification in 1990, Jewish heirs had until 1993 to file claims to property in the former East Germany. Those with no established heir were handed over to the Claims Conference under a 1990 deal that netted the Claims Conference some $3 billion in recovered assets. It sold most of the properties and spent more than $1.6 billion of the proceeds on home care for elderly Holocaust survivors, grants for groups that serve survivors, and Holocaust education. Another $940 million went to a goodwill fund for claimants who missed the deadline to file claims, which let them receive proceeds from the sale of properties that Germany had restituted and were sold.

End-of-life support embodies Jewish values

Making death as comfortable as possible isn't a new idea

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Dr. Michael Gordon

When many people think of palliative care, they imagine a frightening, impersonal hospital ward or hospice where patients go to live out their last days.

But doctors and other health-care workers who have devoted their careers and time to this vital field say the common perception is a myth.

It's an area of medicine that's more about an approach to care than about its location.

"Palliative care is not a place. It's a philosophy," says Dr. Michael Gordon, medical program director of palliative care at Toronto's Baycrest Health Sciences, a world-renowned institution in research and seniors care.

"When we talk about palliative care, we talk about symptom management, comfort, and physical and emotional support – making sure the patient is as pain-free and comfortable as possible."

Palliative Care

First of a 3-part series

Gordon has written and spoken widely on end-of-life situations, especially in relation to the elderly.

He's a member of the University of Toronto's Joint Centre for Bioethics and is involved in ethics education primarily for health-care providers. "End-of-life care is non-specific, though. The terminal phase of a disease can have a long course."

In an interview at Baycrest, Gordon said the birth of modern palliative care is credited to Cicily Saunders, a British nurse and social worker who founded the first modern hospice in London, England, in 1967.

In Judaism, however, the concept goes back to the Middle Ages. "Making one's death as comfortable as possible is not a new idea," he said.

The biblical commandment, "and you shall return it [a lost object] to him [its owner]" (Deuteronomy 22:4) is seen as the halachic basis of a doctor's obligation to heal patients. The 12th-century Jewish philosopher and physician Maimonides interpreted this broadly to mean restoring a patient's body, money and mental health.

The Galloway veil

From the editor's desk...

When the veil falls away, truth has no place to hide.

So it was last week with British MP George Galloway. And the truth he revealed to the world is an ugly one.

The vociferous member of Parliament has established quite a reputation as a pro-Palestinian advocate. He often and gleefully shouts anti-Israel invectives from the low ramparts of his base ideology. He does so in the name of free speech and democratic values on behalf of the Palestinian people whose sovereign, independent homeland he strives earnestly to help bring about.

But his dedication to free speech and democratic values is quite selective. He invokes it for himself and for his causes but not for others or their causes.

That was clearly evident when he quit a debate at Oxford University Feb. 20 in which he was participating after his opponent began to speak. The motion under consideration was: Israel should immediately leave the West Bank.

Galloway spoke for 10 minutes. Then, it was his opponent's turn. When Galloway discovered that his opponent, Eylon Aslan-Levy, was an Israeli citizen, he stormed out of the room, proclaiming that he did not recognize Israel and that he utterly refused to debate with Israelis.

By dashing Aslan-Levy's right to freely and openly debate with him, Galloway effectively tore away the thin veil of his loyalty to democratic principles that he flouts so ostentatiously and sanctimoniously.

But it seems a great many of the anti-Israel activists wear the same veil.

Their loyalty to democratic values and practices extends only as far as the ideas and opinions that they share.

For example, the Times of Israel reported that earlier last week, Israel's deputy ambassador, Alon Roth-Snir, had to abandon a talk at the University of Essex, in England following sustained disruptions by students who did not like what he was saying. He also had to abandon an attempt to deliver his lecture to a smaller group and he then needed protection to leave the building.

Israel's ambassador to Britain, Daniel Taub, had three anti-democratic experiences last week at three different universities. As reported by the Times of Israel, Taub was greeted by loud demonstrators at the University of Ulster and required heavy security protection. At Queen's University in Belfast, his audience was restricted to 12 staff members. And at a third university, in northern England, his identity was kept secret from the audience until minutes before he spoke in order to prevent protests.

To their credit, Israeli embassy staff in Great Britain are not cowed by the craven bullying by the anti-Israel thugs. Ambassador Taub continues to visit as many universities as he can.

The bravery and courage of the Israeli embassy staff in Britain notwithstanding, the point must be made over and over that there should be no need for courage and bravery for anyone to speak on a university campus in a debate or to a gathering of students.

This week, the students at Oxford University were scheduled to vote on a motion calling for boycott, divestment from and sanction (BDS) of Israel. The motion will then be placed on the agenda at the National Union of Students conference in Sheffield in April.

Technically speaking, advocating BDS is not synonymous with advocating anti-democratic values. However, the intellectual underpinning of BDS – especially as proposed against a democracy, indeed, the only democracy in the distinctly undemocratic Middle East – is an affront to conscience.

And, as we have witnessed time and again, during the worst of the Israeli Apartheid Week calumnies, it is the BDS proponents who invoke democracy's rules for themselves but allow none for Israel's advocates.

A spokesperson for the Israeli embassy in London poignantly noted that the verbal abuse, the muzzling, hectoring and physical menace was a betrayal of everything universities should stand for.

"These confused and violent students make a mockery of the very foundations of freedom of speech, a pillar of the academic world. Such behaviour should be strongly condemned by all those who cherish democratic values," the spokesman said.

But as we see so sadly and so regularly, that brutish anti-democratic behaviour is not widely condemned. Indeed, it is a favourite weapon brandished against the Jewish state.

As a member of Parliament, Galloway works at the institution that is the foundational embodiment of democratic values. Yet, he champions democratic values only as it suits him.

It is his veil.

But it no longer hides the truth. It has fallen from his face. And it was his obsessive hatred of Israel that tore it away.

Allan Gould fought 'peacefully for justice'

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

OBITUARY

Allan Gould – a prolific writer, a former CJN columnist and a popular teacher at Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning – died suddenly of a brain aneurysm Feb. 21. He was 68 years old.

A native of Detroit who moved to Toronto to marry his wife, Merle, in 1968, Gould wrote, co-wrote or edited more than 40 books, including The Great Big Book of Canadian Humour; First Stage: The Making of the Stratford Festival; Toronto Street Names; Fodor's Toronto; What Did They Think of the Jews?, and The Unorthodox Book of Jewish Records and Lists.

Danny Siegel – Gould's co-author on the latter book and a close friend from their teenage years in United Synagogue Youth – said in a eulogy that Gould had a palpable "zeeskeit" (sweetness), and spoke with a profundity that often astonished those who heard him.

Siegel recalled Gould's "constant chatter and banter and free association" and his ability to make others laugh.

"Beyond the unending stream of words, there was a tzaddik," he added, referring to Gould's love of tikkun olum, tzedakah, his "insistence on treating people with dignity," and the donation of his organs.

Gould's son, Judah, said in his eulogy, that his father "believed he had to use his skills to fight peacefully for justice in our broken world," and expressed pride in his father's activism. Gould taught literacy in a "freedom school" in rural Mississippi in 1964 as part of the "Freedom Summer" project, aimed at helping the local black population register as voters.

Community praises new religious freedom office

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Major Jewish community organizations united in praising last week's launch of the federal government's new Office of Religious Freedom.

Prime Minister Stephen Harper officially inaugurated the office – it was first conceived in 2011 – on Feb. 19, with an announcement in Maple, Ont., at the Ahmadiyya Muslim Jama'at mosque.

The office will operate under the auspices of the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade and has a $5-million annual operating budget.

Harper appointed Andrew Bennett, 40, a practising Catholic, academic and dean of Augustine College in Ottawa as the office's first "ambassador."

According to the government, the office will "promote freedom of religion and belief, consistent with core Canadian values such as freedom, democracy, human rights and the rule of law" both domestically and worldwide.

It will also "support programming aimed at raising greater awareness of threats to religious freedom and by promoting pluralism."

Harper praised Bennett as a "man of principle and deep convictions" who will promote Canadian values wherever he speaks.

"In Iran, Baha'is and Christians face harassment, imprisonment, and, in some cases, death. In Pakistan, Ahmadiyya Muslims, Shiite Muslims, Christians, Sikhs, and Hindus are vulnerable to persecution and violence. In China, Christians who worship outside government-approved boundaries are driven underground and their leaders are arrested and detained while Uyghur Muslims, Tibetan Buddhists, and Falun Gong practitioners are subjected to repression and intimidation," Harper said.

"Elsewhere we watch in horror as sanctuaries are destroyed and believers are attacked and in some cases slaughtered, Shia Muslim pilgrims in Iraq, Coptic Christian adherents in Egypt, Christians at worship in Nigeria – the list, appallingly, goes on and on. In the face of these injustices and atrocities, Canada will not be silent."

The Jewish community was quick to laud the establishment of the office, with the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), B'nai Brith Canada and Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center Canada (FSWC) all issuing statements within hours of the prime minister's pronouncement.

CIJA chair David Koschitzky, commended the government for the initiative, saying the office is "in keeping with Canada's best traditions of advancing human rights" internationally.

"As history has painfully shown, a given country's treatment of religious minorities is a barometer of its human rights record as a whole," he said. "We look forward to working with the new Office of Religious Freedom and Canadians of all backgrounds in support of this urgent and noble cause."

Frank Dimant, CEO of B'nai Brith Canada, said the office is a "positive step forward" for freedom.

"When you protect the rights of religious minorities, you make real strides towards protection of the rights of all."

Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of the FSWC, also lauded the new office and Bennett's appointment, saying his group is "proud" to support the initiative.

Speaking to reporters on a Feb. 21 conference call, Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism Minister Jason Kenney said Bennett will soon assemble an advisory board that will include Jews and representatives of other faith groups.

The CJN asked Kenney whether his ministry would be monitoring reports and recommendations by Bennett to reconsider countries on Ottawa's new list of countries that don't typically produce refugees if conditions in those countries change. He replied that there are already mechanisms in place for that purpose, but he believes Bennett's office could play a role in providing more information for such decisions.

A spark in dry brush

The Palestinian "street" of late has become a more violent and volatile place. After prayers last Friday, Palestinians, mostly youth, hurled rocks at Israeli troops in Jerusalem's Old City. The rock-throwing, of course, led to a more violent exchange with the Israeli soldiers.

While Palestinians were throwing rocks at Jews from the sanctuary of the Temple Mount, others took to the streets and did the same in Hebron and outside Ofer Prison near Jerusalem.

The ostensible cause of the protests was the re-detention of four Palestinians who had been freed for Gilad Schalit. Another prisoner died in jail, apparently of a heart attack. The cause of his death was being investigated as of this writing. His death sparked even more protest and violence in the streets. The real cause of the protests, however, is the plotting of the Palestinian Authority. The PA has decided to foment an atmosphere of crisis ahead of the upcoming visit to Israel, Jordan and the West Bank by U.S. President Barack Obama.

Of course, there is no surer indicator of crisis in relations between Israel and the Palestinians than violence and possibly even death and "martyrdom" on the streets of the West Bank and Israel. And there has been no surer response to such crisis in the past than pressure by the American administration upon the government of Israel.

Seeing his popularity wane while Hamas popularity rises, and hearing no mention of his cause in the American president's recent State of the Union address, PA President Mahmoud Abbas has decided to stoke the flames of urgency in Obama's Mideast policy. Urgency in Mideast matters has usually translated into the need for Israel to come forward with "confidence-building measures."

Writing for the Gatestone Institute last week, Abu Khaled Toameh, the noted Israeli analyst, quite explicitly defined the PA's goals.

"Palestinian Authority leadership has been encouraging its constituents lately to wage a 'popular intifadah' against Israel, each time finding another excuse to initiate confrontation. Now the Palestinian Authority is using the issue of Palestinian prisoners who are on hunger strike in Israeli prisons as an excuse to call for street protests and clashes with the Israel Defense Forces. The belief in the Palestinian Authority is that the violence on the ground will push Obama to exert pressure on the Israeli government to comply with the Palestinian conditions for resuming the peace process, namely a full cessation of settlement construction and the release of Palestinian prisoners from Israeli jails."

As Toameh also noted, the violence has thus far remained on "a low flame." But as all observers will attest, Abbas' tactic of directed confrontation is very dangerous.

There is very little trust between the two peoples and their respective leaderships. Trust and mutual respect have been unnourished for years, like very dry brush, where all is brittle, spindly and quite without life. The spark that Abbas has thrown onto the brush could start a conflagration.

Once again, he harms his own people. Alas.

25 years ago in The CJN

The final day of the year-long trial of accused war criminal John Demjanjuk ended in Jerusalem with his wife, son and daughter rushing the dais and shouting "liar" in response to the chief prosecutor's claim the defence had hired known antisemites to collect evidence.

Palestinian and Israeli co-operation

As Israelis prepare for U.S. President Barack Obama's visit to Israel, March 20 to March 22, obviously with the intent of reactivating peace talks between Israel and the Palestinian Authority, it is worth noting the benefits currently enjoyed by the Palestinians through the benevolence of the Israeli government. Israel collects and turns over to the Palestinian Authority taxes it collects from Palestinians working in Israel. Israel has equipped and trained the 50,000-member Palestinian police force and co-operates with it to eliminate potential terrorist attacks. There is co-operation between the entities with respect to the use of water and the sale of manufactured goods. With regard to Gaza, Israel provides electricity and fuel and permits the delivery of essential foods, drugs and building supplies. All there remains to be resolved – and of course, these are big issues – are the final borders, the Palestinian refugee situation and, last but not least, the recognition of the right of Israel to exist as a Jewish state.

Kwinter and Jewish education

I'd like to congratulate Monte Kwinter on the longevity of his political career and for making "no secret" of the fact that he is Jewish ("Kwinter becomes Ontario's oldest-ever MPP at 82," Feb. 14). The York Centre Liberal MPP proudly tells of visiting Kiev with a group of Ukrainian Ontarians and successfully suggesting a memorial for the victims of the Nazi massacre at Babi Yar. In my opinion, the victims of the Holocaust would have chosen to be remembered with fewer memorials and more support for future generations of Jews. I, therefore, find it unfortunate that Kwinter does not feel strongly enough to break from his party over their disregard for the Jewish community by removing the tax credit for Jewish education while continuing to fully fund Catholic education far beyond constitutional obligations. One has only to glance at The CJN editorial "Summit on education" (Feb. 14) to appreciate that this is an issue that should be a deal breaker for a Jewish politician.

Remembering Rabbi David Hartman

Permit me to add to the excellent piece "Educator, activist dies at 81" (Feb. 14) about the late Rabbi David Hartman. During the struggle of Soviet Jews to emigrate to Israel, Rabbi Hartman was at the centre of all demonstrations for Soviet Jewry. I believe that we should remind CJN readers about Rabbi Hartman's contribution to the Soviet Jewry episode. I was with him in that struggle, along with my late daughter.

Jews live in poverty in FSU

I commend Dov Harris for his essay on Jews who are living in poverty in the former Soviet Union ("In the shadow of Operation Exodus," Feb. 14). It's for most of us a case of "out of sight, out of mind." The issue of their abject poverty, in many instances, is what strikes a chord. The Brandeis University report, which Harris quotes from, clearly indicates that those in dire straits are clearly pinpointed and accessible, and not just lost in the maze. If UJA Federation of Greater Toronto increased the percentage it annually contributes to the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, the lead organization battling poverty in the former Soviet Union (FSU), it wouldn't affect the other essential campaigns. There is lots of food for thought, and hopefully swift action.

Penny-wise

Rabbi Erwin Schild's guest voice, "Penny ante," (Feb. 14), is a factual, profound, romantic, informative and humorous piece of literature on his objections to the abolishment of the one-cent coin. I can still recall as a child, with great nostalgia, my mother's important search – yes, the dire need – for pennies to deposit into many of her tin tzedakah boxes before she would light the Shabbat candles and say her many Shabbat prayers. I heartily agree with Rabbi Schild's views, all of which make good common cents. We still have two jars filled for his support.

'May my actions benefit all residents'

Ruth Calderon was elected to the Knesset on Jan. 22 as a member of Yair Lapid's Yesh Atid party. She is one of the 27 women in the Knesset and one of 48 individuals elected to the Knesset for the first time. The following is an adapted and abridged version of her inaugural address in the Knesset.

Ruth Calderon

Mr. Chairman, honourable Knesset, the book I am holding [a volume of the Talmud] changed my life, and to a large extent, it is the reason that I have reached this day with the opportunity to speak to the Knesset of Israel as a new member.

I did not inherit a set of Talmud from my grandfather. I was born and raised in a quaint neighbourhood in Tel Aviv. My father, Moshe Calderon, was born in Bulgaria and immigrated to this land as a young man. After the difficult war years, he began studying agriculture at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and was immediately conscripted to defend Gush Etzion during the War of Independence. Eventually, he specialized in entomology and became a global expert in grain storage.

My German-born mother, who had the combined "misfortune" at that time of being Jewish, left-handed and red-haired, made aliyah as a teenager and met my father as a result of the British siege of Jerusalem. By the time the siege ended, my father's Bulgarian neighbours could not say anything but, "She's really nice, Moshiko, but are there no Jewish girls left? You have to marry an Ashkenazi girl?"

I am recounting all of this in order to say that I grew up in a very Jewish, very Zionist, secular-traditional-religious home that combined Ashkenaz and Sepharad, [Revisionist] Betar and [socialist] Hashomer Hatzair, in the Israeli mainstream of the '60s and '70s. I was educated like everyone else my age – public education in the spirit of "from Tanach to Palmach." I was not acquainted with the Mishnah, the Talmud, Kabbalah or Hasidism. By the time I was a teenager, I already sensed that something was missing.

Something about the new, liberated Israeli was good and beautiful, but lacking. I missed depth. I lacked words for my vocabulary. A past – epics, heroes, places, drama, stories – was missing.

The new, Hebrew person created by educators from the country's founding generation realized their dream and fashioned a courageous, practical, and suntanned soldier. But for me, this contained a void. I did not know how to fill that void.

When I first encountered the Talmud, I became completely enamoured with it – its language, its humour, its profound thinking, its modes of discussion, the practicality, humanity, and maturity that emerge from its lines. I sensed that I had found the love of my life, what I had been lacking.

Since then I have studied in batei midrash [Jewish study halls] and in the university, where I earned a doctorate in talmudic literature at Hebrew University. I have also studied lishma, for the sake of the study itself. For many years I have studied daf yomi, the daily page of Talmud with a chavrutah [study partner].

It has shaped who I am. Together with others, I founded Alma, Home for Hebrew Culture in Tel Aviv, and Elul, Israel's first co-ed beit midrash for men and women, religious and secular.

A Jewish renaissance movement has begun to flourish, in which tens and hundreds of thousands of Israelis study within frameworks that do not dictate to them the proper way to be a Jew or the manner in which their Torah is to become a living Torah.

I am convinced that studying the great works of Hebrew and Jewish culture are crucial to constructing a new, Hebrew culture for Israel. It is impossible to stride toward the future without knowing where we came from and who we are.

The Torah is not the property of one movement or another. It is a gift that every one of us received, and we have all been granted the opportunity to meditate upon it as we create the realities of our own lives.

No one took the Talmud and rabbinic literature from us. We gave it away with our own hands when it seemed that another task was more important and urgent: building a state, raising an army, developing agriculture and establishing industry. But the time has come to re-appropriate what is ours, to delight in the cultural riches of our past heritage.

Instead of telling you about this book's beauty, I wish to tell you a story from Talmud, one small story, the story of Rabbi Rechumei, which appears in Ketubot 62b, and through it to say some words about this moment and about the tasks I will set for myself in the Knesset.

Rabbi Rechumei was constantly with Rava in Mechoza. It was his habit to come home every Yom Kippur eve. One day, he became involved in a study topic.

His wife, however, was anticipating his arrival. "Here he comes. Here he comes." But he didn't come. She became upset. She shed a tear. He was sitting on a roof. The roof collapsed under him, and he died.

Rechumei in Aramaic means "love." Rechumei is derived from the word rechem, womb, someone who knows how to include, how to completely accept, just as a woman's womb contains the baby. This choice of word for "love" is quite beautiful. We know that the Greek word for "womb" gives us the word "hysteria." The Aramaic choice, rather, is to take the womb and turn it into a meaning for love. It is a feminist gesture by the Sages.

He (Rechumei) could constantly be found before Rava, the head of the yeshiva at Mechoza. He had been accepted for study in one of the four yeshivot, the "Ivy League" of Babylonia: Nehardea, Mechoza, Pumbedita, and Sura.

It was, however, his habit to come home.

In my view, the Sages do not like people who do things out of habit. In general, when someone in the Talmud is described as doing something out of habit, someone dies within a few lines.

In Aramaic, "home" also means "wife." The word encompasses both wife and home. That is, a man who has no wife is homeless. A woman who has no man, however, is not homeless. But a man without a wife is also without a home.

The Gemara says "he [Rechumei] would habitually come home every Yom Kippur eve." There is a certain rabbinic irony here. What does "every" mean? It means once a year – that is, not very often.

What day is that to choose to come home? Yom Kippur eve? It is not exactly a day for intimacy. It is generally a day for prayer and not even spent at home.

But one day of one time of one year, the topic he was studying drew him in. The study in the beit midrash so fascinated him that he forgot to go home to his wife. He could not abandon his studies, and he did not go home.

But his wife anticipated his return: "Here he comes. Here he comes."

One can hear the hopeful tone of her words in Aramaic: "Hashta atei," Here he comes." This expectation – every text message, every phone call, every footstep, every knock at the door – you are certain it is him. Here he comes. Here he comes.

But he did not come home.

At some point, she realizes he is not coming this year. She becomes upset. This woman, who waited all year, who for many years has waited all year for her single day with her husband, cannot stand it anymore. She becomes upset. She is disappointed. She is sorrowful. She loses control. She sheds a tear. This is an active verb, not a passive one. She allows one tear to fall from her eye onto her cheek after years of not crying.

Now we must imagine a split screen: on one side is a close-up of a female character, a woman with one tear running down her cheek. On the other side, sitting on a rooftop in Mechoza, is Rabbi Rechumei, dressed entirely in white and feeling holy (because of the holiday). He studies Torah on the roof, under the stars, and feels close to the heavens. He sat on the roof.

But, as the single tear falls from the woman's eye, the roof caves in under him. He falls to the ground and dies.

What can I learn from Rabbi Rechumei and his wife about this place [the Knesset] and my work here?

I learn that one who forgets that he is sitting on another's shoulders will fall.

I learn that righteousness is not adherence to the Torah at the expense of sensitivity to human beings.

I learn that often in a dispute, both sides are right. My disputant and I – Rabbi Rechumei and his wife – both feel that we are doing the right thing and that we both are responsible for the home. Sometimes we feel like the woman, waiting, serving in the army, doing all the work while the others sit on the roof and study Torah. Sometimes the others feel that they bear the entire weight of [preserving] our tradition, Torah and culture while we go to the beach and have a blast.

Both I and my disputant feel responsible for the home. Until I understand this, I will not perceive the problem properly and will not be able to find a solution.

It is my aspiration to bring about a situation in which Torah study is the heritage of all Israel, in which the Torah is accessible to all who wish to study it, in which all young citizens of Israel take part in Torah study as well as in military and civil service. Together we will build this home and avoid disappointment.

I long for the day when the state's resources are distributed fairly and equally to every Torah scholar, man or woman, based on the quality of their study, not on their communal affiliation. Through healthy, scholarly competition, the Torah will be magnified and glorified.

I wish to conclude with a prayer composed by my colleague Chaim Hames.

May it be Your will, Lord our God, God of our fathers and mothers, that I leave this house as is entered it – at peace with myself and with others. May my actions benefit all residents of the State of Israel. May I work to improve the society that sent me to this chamber and cause a just peace to dwell among us and with our neighbours. May I always remember that I am a messenger of the public and that I must take care to keep my integrity and innocence intact. May I and we, succeed in all our endeavours.

Why my son couldn't go to Beitar games

My son, Natan, loves Jerusalem's most popular soccer team, Beitar Yerushalyim. He can name every player, his stats and position on the pitch. He reminds me a bit of me when I was about his age and was crazy about the Toronto Maple Leafs, they of Keon, Ellis, Henderson and Salming.

My friend, Howard, and I frequented many a Leafs' Wednesday-night game at the edifice at Carlton and Church, and we'd wait outside the dressing room after they ended, hoping to get players' autographs. They were my prized possessions.

My Leafs' experience was different from Natan's with Beitar. Beitar plays at Teddy Stadium, named after Teddy Kollek, Jerusalem's legendary mayor of yesteryear, and literally a five-minute drive from our home. But Natan has never been to one of their games, because my wife and I won't let him go.

It's not because of the verbal and sometimes physical violence that erupts when some of Beitar's diehard fans/hooligans become frustrated with their team's performance or with a ref's call, although that's reason enough not to send a young teenager to the stadium. Rather, it's mostly a matter of principle. For years Beitar's fan organization, and particularly a vocal group calling itself "La Familia," have prided themselves in the fact the team has never had Arab players on its roster, unlike many of the other Israeli Premier League soccer teams.

And every year, matches played against teams based in Arab towns or cities – this year Maccabi Um El Fahem and Bnei Sakhnin – necessitate the presence of hundreds of police and security guards to ensure public order in and around game venues. During these matches, Beitar fans often shout niceties such as "Death to Arabs" and "Muhammad is dead," while some Arab teams' fans annoyingly refuse to stand for Hatikvah at the beginning of games.

Yair Lootsteen
in Jerusalem

But the story is more complex. Since 2005, Beitar has been owned by Arkadi Gaydamak, a Russian-Israeli billionaire with business and other ties to the former Soviet Union. In early January, he took the entire squad on a two-day jaunt to Grozny, the formerly war-torn and predominantly Muslim capital of the Russian republic of Chechnya, where the team played a friendly match with a local squad, took part in laying a foundation stone for a new synagogue and met with Chechen President Ramzan Kadyrov, a Putin appointee.

Soon after the team's return home, management announced it was signing two Muslim Chechens, Zaur Sadaev and Gabriel Kadiev, in an act that was clearly intended to combat Beitar's racist image.

La Familia was unpleased, to say the least. At a game held at Teddy just days later, fans displayed their rage by cursing Gaydamak and others team officials vociferously, and by unfurling huge banners reading: "Beitar is Pure Forever" and "70 Years of Principles."

It didn't end there. When it became evident Gaydamak and Beitar would not capitulate to fans' demands, someone, unidentified as of yet, torched the team's clubhouse, including its trophy room, with many historic team relics.

This was the absolute "red line" for many of Beitar's more moderate fans (yes, there are some), as well as for the police and public officials known for their support of the team.

As chance would have it, the team's very next game was played at Teddy against Bnei Sakhnin. Once again, heavy security was deployed to separate fans of both teams. This time, however, things were different. Anyone wearing a La Familia shirt was denied entry into the stadium and 96 louts (from both sides) were thrown out during the game.

More importantly, the team and its fan club made a concerted effort to project a more tolerant appearance. Banners throughout the stadium expressed anti-racist slogans, and in the 80th minute, when Chechen defender Kadiev was brought into the game as a replacement, his debut was met with a rousing standing ovation from many in the stands, as well as from Natan in our living room.

Not all was rosy. Whenever Kadiev touched the ball, he was jeered by the diehards, although many others tried to drown out their taunts.

I'd like to believe this was a turning point for Beitar, although much work has yet to be done – mostly in education and law enforcement.

After the Sakhnin game, I told Natan I'd take him to future Beitar games. He's still not sure he wants to go.

Facts, footnotes and political warfare

On Jan. 15, the New York Times – which claims to report "all the news that's fit to print" – belatedly published a front-page article on newly elected Egyptian President Mohamed Morsi's crude antisemitism. This did not fit the image of Morsi as the main hope of what was once advertised as the "Arab Spring," but the evidence was clear and incontrovertible. MEMRI (the Middle East Media Research Institute) had Morsi's words on video – referring to Jews and Zionists as "bloodsuckers," "descendants of apes and pigs," and calling for the removal of Jews from "Palestine" – in other words, ethnic cleansing.

In this and other instances, MEMRI's detailed documentation has had a major impact in bursting the ideological bubbles and wishful thinking that infect much of western discussion and policy on the Middle East. A major part of this upside down world is the portrayal of Arab and Islamic leaders (including Palestinians, beginning with the late Yasser Arafat) in a positive and heroic light, while Israel is presented as the main source of violence, rather than its primary victims. MEMRI presents a much-needed reality check, letting the evidence speak for itself.

Similarly, the indisputable videos and quotes distributed by UN Watch are playing a central role in unmasking the deep immorality of the United Nations Human Rights Council (UNHRC) and its allies. Based in Geneva, UN Watch holds a mirror up to the UNHRC's anti-democracy and anti-Israel behaviour.

Like MEMRI, UN Watch avoids inflated rhetoric and screaming slogans – the unembellished reality is devastating enough. As a result, the UNHRC and its officials are laughing stocks and no longer taken seriously, even in Canadian ministries and among politicians that once worshipped the UN. (NGO Monitor, which I founded to provide accountability and independent analysis of the biases and gross distortions of powerful human rights groups such as Human Rights Watch and Amnesty, is modelled on the approach taken by UN Watch.)

Similarly, the hard work of media monitoring groups such as Honest Reporting, CAMERA and Canada's Media Action is having a steady impact in countering journalists who are quick to propagate the demonizing myths about Israel. CAMERA has been instrumental in exposing false claims and unprofessional reporting in major newspapers, including Ha'aretz and the New York Times, often resulting in the publication of corrections and putting the journalists and editors on notice that their biases and mistakes will be caught. Honest Reporting recently exposed an absurd claim by a Financial Times correspondent alleging that Israel had "paid off" the Bulgarian government in exchange for detailing Hezbollah involvement in a terror attack against Israeli tourists. The embarrassed reporter apologized and his reputation is permanently suspect.

Gerald Steinberg
in Jerusalem

The point highlighted in all of these examples is that solid and consistent research to document false claims, double standards and crude biases (including antisemitism) are central to defeating the demonization campaigns targeting Israel. In contrast, over-the-top emotional outbursts and unsupported allegations, including blog-based rumours and easily refuted urban legends are counterproductive in these difficult battles. Finding, analyzing and exposing the lies about Israel requires detailed and consistent documentation. MEMRI has recorded and published thousands of videos, most of which did not have the explosive impact of Morsi's antisemitic statements.

The fact that much of the reporting about Israel is wildly inaccurate, emotional and biased does not mean that we are free to do the same. In this asymmetric political war, the two sides are allowed to play by different rules, reflecting the power of the anti-Israel myths that have been propagated in the media, on university campuses and by powerful political groups claiming to promote human rights.

As a result, in order to break through the myths and have a long-term impact, we cannot afford even a single and minor error in our reports and documentation. The successes are based on a well-earned reputation for credibility and accuracy, and the ability to embarrass and professionally damage those who repeat false claims or who blatantly ignore information that does not fit their political agendas. In this long and difficult war, quotes and footnotes are our most effective weapons.

Uncertainty besets Israel's relations with Egypt

From the moment Egyptian street protesters forced Hosni Mubarak to step aside as president two years ago this month, Israeli government officials quickly realized, much to their consternation, that Israel's pivotal relationship with Egypt had entered more difficult terrain.

Mubarak, a secular authoritarian leader who inherited the presidency from the murdered Anwar Sadat in 1981, was hardly an ideal partner. Although he preserved the 1979 peace treaty, the first between Israel and an Arab state, and regularly conferred with Israeli prime ministers and cabinet ministers in Cairo – he refused to travel to Israel, except to attend Yitzhak Rabin's funeral – he kept bilateral relations on a distant level.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

He also tolerated antisemitic articles and commentaries in state-supported newspapers and magazines, twice recalled Egypt's envoy in Israel – in 1982 and again in 2000 – and did not crack down hard enough on the contagion of lawlessness in the Sinai Peninsula, a haven for disaffected Bedouins and preying jihadists under the influence of Al Qaeda.

Israel's worst fears materialized during the interim post-Mubarak period, when Egypt was temporarily ruled by a military council headed by the defence minister, Mohamed Hussein Tantawi.

Eight Israelis, including two soldiers, were killed by Arab marauders in a cross-border attack in August 2011. In hot pursuit of the terrorists, the Israeli army accidentally killed several policemen in Egyptian territory.

About a month later, an Egyptian mob stormed and ransacked the Israeli Embassy in Cairo as Egyptian police looked on passively. The entire staff was immediately evacuated to Israel, and the embassy was shuttered. A replacement embassy building has yet to be found.

Beyond these disquieting incidents, the biggest challenge to Israel's bond with Egypt turns on Mohamed Morsi, its first democratically elected president in modern history. Morsi, the candidate of the viscerally anti-Israel Muslim Brotherhood, has moderated his public pronouncements on Israel since assuming office last June, yet he remains unalterably hostile to the Jewish state.

Morsi has pledged to respect the peace treaty, but largely to appease the United States. On the minus side, he has frozen Egypt's already cold relations with Israel and steadfastly refuses to meet its leaders, which means that Israeli contacts with Egypt are maintained through its security/intelligence apparatus.

Last July, in an unmistakable sign of the times, he actually denied having sent Israeli President Shimon Peres a friendly letter in which he expressed hopes for regional security and stability. Three months later, Egypt's new ambassador to Israel, Atef Salem, presented Peres with a letter from Morsi in which he described Peres as a "great friend" and went on to express a desire for strengthening bilateral ties.

A Muslim Brotherhood official dismissed the letter as a hoax, but Morsi's spokesman acknowledged it. Still another Muslim Brotherhood official, a founder of Morsi's Freedom and Justice party, accused Morsi of treason and urged him to resign.

Mohamed Morsi

Shortly afterward, video footage from a prayer service in an Egyptian mosque showed Morsi silently mouthing "amen" to incendiary comments made by the director of a religious endowment, who declared, "Oh Allah, destroy the Jews and their supporters. Oh Allah, disperse them and rend them asunder."

Early this year, the Middle East Media Research Institute released the transcript of a 2010 interview posted on the Internet in which Morsi lashed out at Zionists and Jews. He described Zionists as "bloodsuckers" and the descendants of pigs and apes, and suggested that "criminal Zionists" had no national rights in Israel. And in a page out of the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, he accused Jews of sowing civil strife in countries where they are citizens. On a visit to Berlin, Morsi claimed that his comments had been taken out of context and that he respected Judaism. But his apology was abjectly lame and utterly unconvincing.

On the day he issued this clarification, an Egyptian government official close to Morsi, Shihab Eddim, the editor-in-chief of state-controlled Egyptian newspapers, brazenly called the Holocaust a "myth," claiming that the six million Jews murdered by the Nazis had in fact moved to the United States during World War II.

To members of the Muslim Brotherhood, such ahistorical comments are neither jarring nor inappropriate. Since Morsi's accession to power eight months ago, a succession of Muslim Brotherhood officials have issued a steady stream of vitriolic comments that truly reflect opinion within that Islamic organization.

Last August, Ahmed Subei, a media advisor to Morsi's Freedom and Justice party, denounced Egypt's peace treaty with Israel as "a mark of shame" and demanded that it be amended. Last September, Mohamed Saif al-Dawla, Morsi's adviser on Arab affairs, referred to Israel as "occupied Arab Palestine." Last October, Mohamed Badie, the Supreme Guide of the Muslim Brotherhood, demanded Israel's destruction and claimed that Jews "spread corruption." Last December, a senior Muslim Brotherhood official, Essam el-Erian, urged Egyptian Jews living in Israel to return to Egypt and leave Israel for the Palestinians.

On the brighter side, Morsi has promised to spare no effort to rid Sinai of Islamic fundamentalist terrorists, but his officials have called for the revision of the peace treaty, a pillar of stability in the Middle East, and have warned that Israeli incursions into Sinai to deal with fleeing terrorists will be met with force.

Despite the depth of anti-Israel opinion within Egypt's elite, Egypt, in concert with Israel, has taken firm steps to try to wipe out terrorism in Sinai. Since jihadists killed 16 Egyptian border guards last August, Israel has temporarily waived clauses in the peace treaty pertaining to Egyptian troop limits and permitted Egypt to carry out massive anti-terrorist raids in Sinai.

Last summer, for the first time since the 1973 Yom Kippur War, Egypt deployed aircraft, missiles, heavy artillery and tanks to restore a measure of calm there. Since then, Egypt has seized tons of military equipment and munitions bound for Gaza, some of them from Libya, and flooded arms smuggling tunnels used by Hamas and other groups, saying the tunnels destabilize the Sinai.

Israeli Minister of Strategic Affairs Moshe Ya'alon has applauded these efforts, which are plainly in Egypt's interests, but in the meantime, Israel has continued to build a 232-kilometre-long security fence from Gaza to Eilat to keep out infiltrators and African refugees. But as Israeli chief of staff Gen. Benny Gantz says, the barrier will not be foolproof.

Last November, just before voicing support for the Palestinian campaign to win upgraded observer status at the United Nations, Morsi played a key role in ending Israel's eight-day border war with Hamas and its Islamic allies in the Gaza Strip. But on the first day of the war, he condemned Israel's operation, threatened to cancel the peace treaty in the event of an Israeli invasion of Gaza and recalled Egypt's newly installed ambassador in Tel Aviv.

Shortly after his election, in a dramatic shift away from Egypt's formerly cool attitude to Hamas, Morsi invited Ismail Haniyeh, the prime minister of Gaza, to Cairo, and eased restrictions on Palestinians crossing into Egypt from Gaza.

Clearly, a new and uncertain era has dawned in Israel's relations with Egypt.

Bedouin first non-Jew to head Israeli college

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

When Israel's Achva Academic College installed Alean Al-Krenawi as its new president last year, it made history.

Al-Krenawi became the first-ever non-Jewish head of an Israeli academic institution and a hero to Bedouins across the country.

Alean Al-Krenawi

The school, which offers degrees in education, is located between Tel-Aviv and Be'er Sheva and is "dedicated to diversity."

Born and raised in a Bedouin tribe that bears his family name in the Negev, Al-Krenawi said he's one of 15 siblings and the only one to have attended a high school and university. He earned a bachelor's degree from Ben-Gurion University of the Negev and a master's from Hebrew University, both in social work, as well as a PhD in the same subject from the University of Toronto in 1995.

Al-Krenawi, 51, was a visiting professor at the University of Calgary in 2009-2010. He then became dean of the school of social work at Memorial University of Newfoundland from 2010 to 2012 before moving to Achva College.

He said he feels a deep kinship with both Canada and Israel, particularly with the Jewish communities of both countries.

Toronto has a "special place in my heart," he said. "I used to celebrate holidays with the Jewish community here all along Bathurst Street."

Speaking at the Lipa Green Centre to journalists and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's committee on Israeli and Arab issues – which brought the professor to Toronto in conjunction with the Israeli consulate in Toronto – Al-Krenawi said he decided last year that it was time to help bring more of his fellow Bedouins into the academic realm.

Almost 20 per cent of Achva students are Bedouin, he said.

Al-Krenawi said he also felt a need to build better relations between Jewish and Bedouin Israelis.

He said he was strongly encouraged by Jewish friends and colleagues to take his current job at Achva College.

One of the first things he did in his new role was make it a priority for students and staff to interact with Bedouins. The aim was to give them role models at an institution of higher learning and inspire them to dream of achievements outside their traditional tribal existence.

Bedouins rank among the lowest socio-economic groups in Israel.

Of the 3,000 or so Bedouin teens who graduate high school annually in Israel, only 20 per cent go to university or college, Al-Krenawi said.

Bedouin parents are typically very resistant to sending their children away to school, he added.

Much of the opportunity for Bedouin students to go to schools of higher learning comes from philanthropic sources, he said.

"The departure point for Bedouins is not the same as for [Jewish] Israeli students. They start with less resources and money. But we're trying to shift the Bedouin from a traditional life to modern life," Al-Krenawi said.

Asked whether he encountered friction from Jewish staff at Achva as the college's first non-Jewish president, he said some faculty members weren't happy, but he chooses not to dwell on the negative.

"In my life, no matter where I am, I always look at people as human beings. I don't go into politics. I'm not a politician, but I do believe that when you get to know others, you start to know yourself," he said.

Al-Krenawi said he believes Bedouins will be motivated by his example and that his appointment will help "change the Israeli discourse" on inter-communal relations.

"I'm asking for your help," he told the committee. "I want other Arabs in Israel to look at me and dream and know they too can get there. In this, I am supported from all cultures in Israel.

"We are a big family [in Israel] and big families always have different opinions. But I want it known that any non-Jew can achieve what I have. We are all Israelis."

He did sound a note of caution, however, noting that the cost of tuition at most Israeli universities is prohibitive for Bedouin students. As a result, many choose to attend Palestinian schools, which offer subsidies but often inculcate "negative ideologies" toward Jews and Israel.

"This is a great danger," Al-Krenawi said. "It poses a risk when the control of what is being taught is taken out of the hands of those trying to integrate the societies."

It can also lead to radicalization of some students.

"We need to open up the Israeli society to give Bedouins and other Arabs opportunities. Equal opportunity should be the policy of the government" toward education, he said.

Kol Ami celebrates 25 years

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

A series of activities to celebrate Temple Kol Ami's 25th anniversary resumes March 1, when Jewish singer/songwriter Alan Goodis participates in Shabbat evening services at the Thornhill congregation.

The following morning, Goodis, who grew up at Temple Har Zion, will teach music at the temple's Saturday morning religious school.

As well, a gala celebration will take place May 26.

Rabbi Micah Streiffer, who became spiritual leader in 2011, said the congregation, with 170 families, is undergoing a "renaissance" and has begun to grow.

But a lot of people still aren't familiar with the congregation, he noted. "I think name recognition is our biggest challenge."

Being a small congregation comes with challenges, but also benefits, he added. "It's an intimate community, a warm community, a welcoming community, because we're relatively small."

Rabbi Micah Streiffer

To introduce the temple and its religious school to new families, it is running a program called "Taste of Kol Ami." For $36, children can attend the school on Saturday mornings and Wednesday nights for seven weeks, beginning at the end of March.

On Shabbat mornings, kids go upstairs for classes, while parents stay downstairs for Torah study and then religious services. At noon, the families come together for a half-hour family education service.

For the future, Rabbi Streiffer said, "my hope is that we can continue to build on our program of learning, worship and social action, and continue to be a presence within the Toronto community."

Kol Ami president Kathy Stein, who joined the congregation with her husband and two children, now 22 and 25, 22 years ago, remembers when there were fewer than 50 families at the shul.

She and her husband Barry, a past president of Kol Ami, became involved early on, and were youth advisers for 10 years.

She said one of the biggest challenges over the years was "meeting people's expectations" as the shul grew.

One expectation was "a place of our own. That was a challenging time as we evaluated several paths."

Kol Ami, which had rented space at Leo Baeck Day School in Thornhill for many years, bought land in 2001 at 8777 Dufferin St., but never ended up building there. The land was sold in 2010. There were also plans to move to the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan and partner with Bialik Hebrew Day School, but those fell through.

"In the long run, we decided that ... there's no place like home," she said. That led to a partnership with the school and the renovation of what is now Kol Ami's permanent home.

Selling the land at a profit, and creating a reserve fund, "gave us the ability to do what we've done at Leo Baeck," Stein said, referring to renovations in the sanctuary, common rooms, small chapel and youth lounge for both the school and the congregation to use.

She described the congregation as "extremely participatory. Over 80 per cent (of members) either come to services or school, or volunteer... We are not a three-day-a-year synagogue. It's extremely welcoming."

Arlene Blostein, a founding member and longtime choir member, recalls attending High Holiday services at Leo Baeck's former location on Kenton Drive, when the congregation was just getting off the ground. At the time, there were only 13 families, and Rabbi Steven Garten – then the school's director, and now the rabbi of Temple Israel in Ottawa – led the services.

"I don't think we had a name yet, and I don't think we knew whether things were going to continue," Blostein said.

Rabbi Nancy Wechsler became the founding rabbi after conducting a summer service in a member's backyard. "That was it, from then on," said Blostein.

Rabbi Wechsler was with the congregation until 1996. She was followed by Rabbi Daniel Gottlieb, who preceded Rabbi Streiffer, with Rabbi Sharon Sobel serving as interim rabbi for six months before Rabbi Streiffer began.

Blostein said that for her and her husband Barry, and for other young families at the time, the congregation "became our focal point for everything, not just religious needs but social needs and community."

"I guess I like the fact that we have stayed true to our initial sense of what we wanted to accomplish... We wanted to remain very community oriented, family oriented... and make it enjoyable and accessible to all."

Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem (CFHU) are hoping their contest will bring out Canadians' inner Albert Einstein.

"We're living in a world where people are sometimes too hesitant to express their ideas or points of view," said Rami Kleinmann, president and CEO of CFHU. "We want to create the environment for people to not be too concerned or shy or afraid to let their mind flourish."

Rami Kleinmann

That's the concept behind their new contest, Searching for the Next Einstein, in which participants will submit 300-word outlines of their best idea to improve the world.

The competition comes with a $10,000 prize and the opportunity to present the idea in June at the Israeli Presidential Conference in Jerusalem. The conference, created by Israeli President Shimon Peres, brings together experts in various fields from around the world, including this year's guests, former American president Bill Clinton and former British prime minister Tony Blair.

Kleinmann said he felt the Einstein contest was a natural fit for a conference that honours great thinkers and leaders.

Contest entries are not limited to ideas in the field of science. Albert Einstein, who was one of Hebrew University's founders, was a great thinker in so many aspects of life, such as arts and philosophy, so the idea can improve any aspect of the world.

Submissions will be posted online for a popular vote, and they will also go through a panel of judges. The entry with the highest points from both the online voting and the judges will be the winner.

The panel of judges consists of experts in a variety of fields, which will allow them to consider entries from these various areas of study. Nobel laureate Robert Kornberg is the chairman of the judging panel, which consists of seven judges all of whom have a connection to Hebrew University, either as alumni, scholars or scientists.

The fact that so many major corporations are sponsoring the contest means it could reach 25 million people, said Miriam Pilc-Levine, national director of communications and marketing for CFHU. She believes it may be the largest outreach campaign ever done on behalf of a Jewish organization.

"It's exactly symbolizing that when you come up with a good project and exciting message, you can get a support even if there's a big Israeli stamp on it," Kleinmann said, explaining that most of the sponsors are not specifically Jewish or Israel-focused. "We get support from everybody."

The contest ends on April 22, which is also Earth Day. Kleinmann said this date was picked because they wanted to counter the fact that so many people spend the days outlining the negativity and problems of the world.

Instead, they hope to give a positive spin to the environment-awareness day, to show how people love the world and want to improve it, Kleinmann said.

Anybody can enter the contest, since a brilliant idea can hit a person at any point in his or her life, he added.

The fact that so much innovation has come out of Israel, despite it being surrounded by enemies and facing years of war, is something that should encourage people, he said.

"If Israel can reach all the achievements in [so many] fields, there's no reason the individual... can't make a substantial contribution to the world."

Toronto teens take part in BBYO convention

Compiled by CJN Staff

Twenty-nine Toronto-area teens were among 2,000 Jewish teen leaders, educators, volunteers and philanthropists from 18 countries who gathered in Washington, D.C., recently for BBYO's annual International Convention (IC).

This year's convention, from Feb. 14 to 18, included delegations from Albania, Argentina, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Canada, Croatia, Estonia, France, Ireland, Israel, Latvia, Macedonia, Serbia, Switzerland, Turkey, Ukraine, the United Kingdom and from across the United States.

For nearly 90 years, IC has served to bring together the rising leaders of BBYO's AZA chapters (for young men) and BBG chapters (for young women) and to set the course for the coming year, determine strategies for strengthening BBYO as a youth-led movement and connect teens to the worldwide Jewish community.

Ten teens who will serve on the 2013-14 AZA and BBG International boards were elected at IC.

The convention began with a video message from U.S. President Barack Obama, welcoming participants to Washington. He said that the IC is a gathering that "gives you a chance to affirm your faith and recommit yourselves to the enduring values this organization represents." He encouraged the teens to return home, spread their enthusiasm and show the important role that young people play in making a difference in society. Visit tiny.cc/icvideo to watch Obama's complete video message.

Canadian delegates celebrate their arrival at BBYO convention in Washington, DC.

Judy Feld Carr, who rescued thousands of Syrian Jews in the 1970s; Ben Keesey, CEO of Invisible Children, and Michael Froman, assistant to the U.S. president and Deputy National Security Adviser for International Economic Affairs, spoke at the convention.

Froman, an alumnus of BBYO and former Grand Aleph Godol (International Teen President), said BBYO contributed most to who he is today.

At the BBYO Stand UP Day of Service and Advocacy plenary, BBYO welcomed alumni engaged in Jewish communal service, educational and entrepreneurial work around the world. At the plenary, Democratic National Committee chairwoman and Congresswoman Debbie Wasserman Schultz (D-Fla.) received the BBYO Stand UP Lifetime Achievement Award. She spoke about the importance of standing up for critical causes of the day. Josh Mandel (R-Ohio), a Marine Corps veteran and State Treasurer of Ohio, also addressed the group. Wrapping up the plenary, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, Susan Rice, delivered a call to action before the delegates went into the D.C. community for hands-on service and advocacy training.

"BBYO's International Convention brought together an amazing community of partners, guests, alumni, speakers and performers," said Logan Miller, International Teen President of BBYO. "The magnitude and stature of our guests is a testament to the work of our members across the world this year, doing everything bigger and better on behalf of the Jewish future."

Other programs and events during the convention included a day of learning, when teens attended more than 30 learning sessions on such topics as Israel, Global Jewish Peoplehood, Jewish Continuity and Media and Entrepreneurialism.

At the convention, 24 teen-led Shabbat services celebrated the pluralism of BBYO. Ben Stein, an actor, writer, lawyer and commentator on political and economic issues, and Laurie Moskowitz, a senior director for U.S. Campaigns at The ONE Campaign (which presses governments to deliver change that will improve the lives of people living in extreme poverty), received BBYO's Alumni of the Year awards.

Giant matzah ball presents some challenges

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

When Zale Turner wanted to do something different at his fundraising event for Beit Halochem Canada, he hired a company called DareSeeker to create something his guests would remember: the world's largest matzah ball.

"When people go to war, you can lose an arm or a leg," said Turner, who chose to work for Beit Halochem because the money raised supports disabled Israeli war veterans and victims of terror. The goal was to raise $100,000.

"We also wanted to relate to that courage and dare," he said. So they called on DareSeeker to help them.

The company quickly got to work to meet the dare and produce what they believe is the world's biggest matzah ball –Guinness World Records lists a 267-pound matzah ball prepared in New York City in August 2009 as the largest, and a group in Tucson, Ariz., made one in 2010 that they said weighed in at 488 pounds.

Bagel World at Bathurst Street and Wilson Avenue donated the ingredients and utensils, and the DareSeeker team got started. They bought a four-by-four-foot custom-made pot in which to cook the 524-pound matzah ball, and spent five hours preparing it, using 1,200 eggs, 150 pounds of matzah meal and nine litres of grapeseed oil.

But that was the easy part. It took more than 30 hours for the matzah ball to cook, and they were constantly worried that it would boil over or break.

"It was twice as big as the stove," said Alex Shafran, one of the founders of DareSeeker. Luckily, he said, they managed to perfect the one-handed egg crack early on. In total, they spent 48 hours non-stop, cooking and sleeping at Bagel World.

"A couple of times, we came in and it started smoking," Shafran said. "We hooked up some fans and got some air blowing."

But even after the matzah ball was cooked, they had to transport it downtown to The Hoxton, the venue where the Feb. 13 fundraising event, Love of Courage, was taking place, and where about 500 young professionals were waiting for the world's largest matzah ball.

"I was sitting in the back, hugging the matzah ball to my chest," said Spencer Shafran, co-founder of DareSeeker. "At every bump and turn, I prayed, 'Please don't break.'"

The 500-pound-plus matzah ball made it to the party safe and all in one piece. It was put on display at the event, covered in a thick, yellow, felt blanket in a makeshift enclosure to keep it from breaking, and garnished with carrots and dill. It didn't exactly look like a matzah ball – it turned out to be dark brown and had a surprisingly soft touch on top, but was much tougher at the bottom. Although they were proud of their cooking skills, the Shafrans didn't recommend tasting it.

It was long, hard and sweaty work, but that's what they signed up for. DareSeeker, which launched in 2012, is a site where users can suggest dares they want other people to do – or dare themselves.

"It's like the new version of America's funniest home videos," said Aiden Parker, vice-president of marketing for DareSeeker. They hope to do more publicity stunts and larger dares like this one, and if it involves raising money for charity, that's a bonus, he said.

Turner wants to educate his peers about Beit Halochem while they have fun. "It's a charity that's small, and no one our age knew about this, even though it's well-known in the older generation," he said, adding that creating the world's largest matzah ball was a good way to get their attention.

Friends dance to help cure cancer

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Lisa Gardner Plant and a group of friends want to dance to end cancer.

The women are joining together to take part in the second annual Dance to Conquer Cancer – Disco Days and Boogie Nights, hosted by Princess Margaret Cancer Foundation.

The event, to take place March 3 at the Paramount Conference and Event Centre in Woodbridge, Ont., features fitness guru Richard Simmons and the singing group the Pointer Sisters.

Beginning at noon, about 500 participants will take part in a three-hour dance-a-thon, in which they will be challenged to dance 10,000 steps with moves from the 1970s and 1980s.

At 6 p.m., the evening portion begins with dinner, dancing and entertainment by the Pointer Sisters.

Gardner Plant said her group of 10 Jewish women, who all work out together, have a special reason to be participating in the event.

One of the dancers, Elysa Shaffron, 44, is battling adrenal cancer and is currently undergoing treatment at Princess Margaret.

Gardner Plant said that although each dancer must raise $500 to participate, the goal of their team is to raise as much money as possible.

Paul Alofs, president and CEO of the hospital's foundation, said in a press release that "we hope our Dance to Conquer Cancer fundraiser will inspire those touched by cancer, while offering people a one-of-a kind engaging event using the elements of dance and disco."

Although the Nazis forbade Jews in the Lodz Ghetto to possess cameras, a few Jewish photographers were commissioned to document the efficiency of Ghetto labour. At their own initiative and at personal risk, they took thousands of photographs that reflect the efforts of ghetto inhabitants to maintain their dignity and culture in unspeakably harsh circumstances.

Yeshiva U students head abroad

Torontonians take part in community-building missions

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

Sometimes the best education happens outside the classroom.

That's why Yeshiva University's Center for the Jewish Future sent 91 undergraduate students, including three from Toronto, on community-building missions to Israel, Nicaragua, Mexico and the United States last month.

One of these trips, called Jewish Life Coast to Coast, took 20 students to Texas. Among them was Toronto native Elianne Neuman, a graduate of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto who is now a first-year student at YU's Stern College for Women.

"The trip showed me that a leader can be anybody. It doesn't matter how old you are, what you are doing, where you live – it matters that you have passion and a vision," said Neuman, 19.

While visiting the Jewish communities in Houston, Dallas and San Antonio, Neuman and her peers met with community leaders, rabbis, pastors and business leaders. For her, one visit in particular stood out.

"We met with this young Jewish guy, under 30, with four kids, who is trying to open a Jewish day school all by himself," she said. "He's basically our age. Which one of us would think we'd be 28 and opening a Jewish day school by ourselves? But we [got to see] this example in front of us."

The opportunity to learn about different Jewish leaders was what attracted her to the trip. She said YU wants students not only to succeed academically but also to learn how to become a community leader, which was one of the main goals of these trips. "There's a real sense of community here on campus, and I think that they want their students to be able to continue that sense of community when they're off campus," she said.

And if you're going to become a Jewish leader, you need to learn about Jewish communities all over the world.

Elyashiv Gemara, who grew up in Toronto, is now studying business management at YU. Gemara, who said she had always heard about these missions, had the opportunity to go on one of YU's "winter camps" in Israel. At the camp, 39 YU students taught English enrichment through art to 450 students in Jerusalem, Kiryat Malachi and Dimona.

"Every day we had a lesson planned out – a direct educational program and then an art project that had something to do with the lesson given," said Gemara, 22. "The lesson was given in English, and it was unbelievable to see the improvement in the kids' English in just one week."

At the end of the week, the kids all hung up their art projects. "The kids absolutely lit up," she said. "It was amazing to see that after just one week many of the quiet kids were ecstatic about what they were able to accomplish."

Daniella Philips, a marketing student at YU's Stern College for Women, didn't realize that when she signed up to teach low-income kids in Israel she would be learning a lot herself.

"I really underestimated the job that we were doing. I thought we would go down for a week, teach the students in class and then leave – a one-week mission," said Philips. "I hadn't realized the impact and the friendships that were developed over a short week. The students were crying as we said 'bye' to them and danced us to the bus."

She said it opened her eyes to the power of giving back to someone else. "These missions let you experience things you wouldn't have the chance to otherwise," she said. "It's an opportunity to get to know a different Jewish community other than your own and to get to know Jews who live differently than you do. It's about showing that no matter where you're from, we're all Jewish and we're all connected."

Generous gift creates Silber Family Centre for Jewish Camping

New Centre part of UJA Federation's Jewish camping initiative

By Daniel Koren

Now, it's even easier to send your kids to camp.

Thanks to Toronto community leader and philanthropist Allan Silber and his family, who recently made a generous gift of $1.2 million to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Jewish Camping initiative, the newly established Silber Family Centre for Jewish Camping will usher in a new era for Jewish overnight camps.

The Centre will be investing in innovative programs and services that will increase the number of Jewish campers in the Greater Toronto Area.

The Silber Family gift and the creation of the Centre has already made a significant impact on Jewish camping with the expansion of Toronto's groundbreaking campership incentive program, TopBunk, to include day school students and three additional camps.

Over the past five years, TopBunk has brought over 1,600 campers to overnight camps by offering a grant to families of first-time campers. Now, the Silber Family Centre is looking to reach over 500 new campers a year.

This year, The Centre, in conjunction with the Foundation for Jewish Camps, is launching a multiyear institutional strengthening program for Ontario's Jewish camps, bringing cutting-edge knowledge and professional development to our local camps.

Allan and Hinda Silber

"Our camps, while diverse, all offer tremendous experiences, where the kids have a wonderful time and engage in outdoor sports, swimming, hiking, and more. What separates us from other camps is that we do it with a Jewish atmosphere, with a Jewish peer group where we nurture Jewish values," said Bryan Keshen, UJA's Vice President of Emerging Communities and Jewish Camping. "Every camper benefits from having such a profound Jewish experience so early in their lives."

First-time campers whose families have utilized the TopBunk incentive grant have spoken highly of being in a fun learning environment that teaches them the importance of Jewish values like community and tzedakah. "The Jewish camp experience has given me a lot of good friends and a lot of new Jewish values that will stay with me forever," said one enlightened camper, 18-year-old Raffi Massil. "If it wasn't for camp, I wouldn't be connected to Jewish life."

As many of the camps host young Israeli emissaries and students, the experience also gives Canadian youth the chance to meet Israelis their own age, fostering a deep and lasting relationship between them and the people of Israel.

And it's not just Canadians who understand the value of Jewish camp. TopBunk is the Canadian equivalent of an American program, One Happy Camper, which is also supported through the Foundation for Jewish Camps. The Foundation has confirmed its plan to merge the two programs, to be known as One Happy Camper, later this year.

Visit www.topbunk.ca to apply for a $1,000 grant today. Participating camps include Camps; George, Gesher, Kadimah, Moshava, Northland, Ramah, Shalom, Solelim & Shomria.

Jewish Free Loan Toronto introduces new "Mitzvah Loan"

On July 12th, 1924, 12 devoted members of Toronto's Jewish community established the Toronto G'milath Chasodim Association, a free loan agency that would help local Jewish residents in dire need of temporary financial assistance. As the community continued to flourish, the agency expanded to support any applicant deserving of relief that could benefit from this unique, interest-free micro-loan.

Today, through its mandate of "helping people to help themselves," the not-for-profit association now known as Jewish Free Loan Toronto (JFLT) continues to support our community by offering three different kinds of loans: personal, education, and small business start-up.

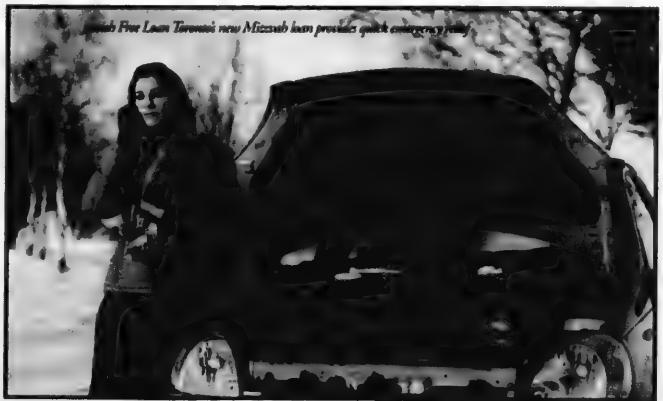
Now, for the first time in 88 years, JFLT, whose operating costs are funded through UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and United Way, is offering a new kind of loan, one whose name is coincidentally synonymous with the organization itself.

The Mitzvah loan, unlike other JFLT loan categories, is available without the consent of a guarantor, providing applicants with immediate emergency assistance and a cheque for up to $720 within two days of first contact. It is JFLT's way of reaching out even further to our community. Whether your car broke down, or you have unforeseen medical/dental expenses, or there is simply a family emergency where a little extra money can provide quick relief, the Mitzvah loan offers Jewish Toronto's working class a hand-up, not a handout.

"This is our way of continuing the traditions handed down to us, and finding new and useful ways to better serve our community," said the organization's Executive Director, Michael Freedman. "It's these kinds of new initiatives that will make more people aware that our organization exists and that we are here to help in any way we can."

As if the Mitzvah loan wasn't enough, JFLT offers loans to university and college students up to $7,500, personal loans up to $5,000, and start-up business loans up to $15,000. Each loan is interest-free, and is repaid on a pre-determined, monthly basis. "It's a cycle," said Freedman. "When we finish helping somebody, the money goes back into the pot and helps the next person, and so on. I guess you could say we're the original recyclers."

In the last few years, 92% (on average) of those who applied were successful in receiving loans from Jewish Free Loan Toronto, located in the Lipa Green Centre for Jewish Community Services on Sherman Campus. Loans are available to Jewish residents of the GTA who are Canadian citizens or permanent residents of Canada. According to Freedman, the agency will be coming out with even more types of loans this year to appeal to a broader demographic within Jewish Toronto.



Jewish Free Loan Toronto's new Mitzvah loan provides quick emergency relief.

Running in Tel Aviv

My View

Lawrence Hart

In any serious distance runner's calendar, late April is marked off for the Boston Marathon and early November for the 42.2-kilometre race through the five boroughs of New York City. For those seeking to compete in Europe, there are, of course, the celebrated springtime runs in London, Paris and Rome or the fall races in Berlin and Amsterdam.

However, late winter into early spring has become Israel's time, and not for just one marathon. Almost as though rivalling each other for bragging rights, high-profile internationally recognized marathons are held within two weeks of each other during March in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv.

For a land as small as Israel, the numbers these runs attract are impressive. The 2013 Jerusalem Marathon will draw more than 17,000 participants, while Tel Aviv will host an estimated 35,000 runners on March 15 (hailed as "chag marathon," a marathon holiday), making it the largest event of its kind ever held in that part of the world. Several other competitions will run concurrently with the full marathon, including a half-marathon, two "kids mini-marathons" and 10-kilometre and 4.2-kilometre races.

Every big city marathon has its own memorable qualities. Whether it be Boston, New York, Washington, London, Toronto or Montreal – and I've run them all – each one is unique and fascinating, both in the context of terrain covered and landmarks seen, but even more so in terms of the challenges to body and spirit that motivate runners to get from start to finish in as satisfying a time as possible.

But inasmuch as established road races in the running meccas of Europe and North America are at once distinctive and inspiring, there is arguably little that can compare with running in Israel, whether it's in the Jerusalem or Tel Aviv events or in another, lesser known, marathon held annually in the Galilee.

What could possibly be more wonderful than starting a race at the Knesset and then taking in the vistas of Mount Scopus, the Old City, and the Jerusalem Forest, all of them marking the route of the Jerusalem Marathon? Or what about running along the shores of the Kinneret (Sea of Galilee) or the Tel Aviv beachfront, which create such stunning backdrops to the Tiberias and Tel Aviv marathons, respectively?

I was able to be a part of the Tel Aviv half-marathon last year, running it with my Israeli son-in-law, Oran. Aside from just the sheer enjoyment of doing the race together, the experience was even more especially meaningful in that it was his first attempt at this distance and likely my last. With over 40 years, and countless thousands of miles, of pounding, my hips are showing inevitable signs of wear, so my days of competitive running are, sadly, coming to an end.

Oran will be at the start line of the half-marathon again this year, with my daughter, Ilana, entered in her first 10-kilometre race. And though the two of them live in Tel Aviv and know the city well, I suspect that even they will discover new panoramas of their urban landscape that are visible only to those who choose to run its streets and byways.

Today, a look at historic visits, unique moments and recurring themes as Mister President goes to Israel. [http://bit.ly/ispres1]

President Richard Nixon – June 1974

Less than a year after the Yom Kippur War, Nixon met with president Ephraim Katzir and prime minister Yitzhak Rabin. A hot topic at the time was the United States assisting Egypt to attain atomic power in order to sway it from Soviet influence. "The main catch," Time magazine noted, was "working out a foolproof safeguard system to guarantee that the Egyptians could not use the nuclear equipment to make atomic weapons." [http://bit.ly/ispres12]

President Jimmy Carter – March 1979

As he addressed the Knesset, Carter attempted to ensure momentum of the recently signed Camp David Accords. "I know from my intense personal involvement in these negotiations that president [Anwar] Sadat and prime minister [Menachem] Begin have not wavered from their often expressed commitment to peace… But we have not yet fully met our challenge. Despite our unflagging determination, despite the extraordinary progress of the past six months, we still fall short." [http://bit.ly/ispres4]

President Bill Clinton – October 1994, November 1995, March 1996, December 1998

It is Clinton's second visit to attend the funeral of prime minister Yitzhak Rabin that is most remembered. Clinton concludes his eulogy, "This week, Jews all around the world are studying the Torah portion in which God tests the faith of Abraham, patriarch of the Jews and the Arabs. He commands Abraham to sacrifice Yitzhak… Now God tests our faith even more terribly, for he has taken our Yitzhak. But Israel's covenant with God for freedom, for tolerance, for security, for peace – that covenant must hold. That covenant was prime minister Rabin's life's work. Now we must make it his lasting legacy… Shalom, haver." [http://bit.ly/ispres6]

President George W. Bush – January 2008, May 2008

On his second visit, Bush addressed the Knesset to commemorate Israel's 60th anniversary. He seemed to have grasped the Israeli sensibility when he prefaced his remarks by saying, "It's a rare privilege for the American president to speak to the Knesset. Although the prime minister told me there's something even rarer – to have just one person in this chamber speaking at a time." [http://bit.ly/ispres9]

President Barack Obama – July 2008

This won't be Obama's first trip to Israel. In July 2008, the Democratic presidential candidate visited "the brave citizens of this town of Sderot. For seven years they've endured constant threats to their security… I'm here to say as an American and as friend of Israel that we stand with the people of Sderot and with all the people of Israel… living alongside a viable and peaceful Palestinian state." [http://bit.ly/ispres10]

Obama then refers to the threat posed by "an Iranian regime that sponsors terrorism, pursues nuclear weapons and threatens Israel's existence. A nuclear Iran would pose a grave threat and the world must prevent Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon."

Candidate Obama's comments will undoubtedly come up once again as President Obama returns to Israel almost five years later.

"נולדתי בעפולה עם זכרונות משפחתיים על אלכסנדר מן שביקר את ידידו אלכסנדר זייד בגבעות שייך אבדך. סבי היה הקורבן הראשון לפרעות הערבים בעמק, וכל חיי אני חולך עם זכרונות אלכסנדר מן" אומר דחדו. אלא שבניגוד לרובנו, קם דחדו ועשה מעשה, ובמשך שלוש שנים עבד עם יורם צ'רקסקי באיסוף ועריכה של כל החמרים הקיימים על אלכסנדר מן. והתוצאה מאוד מרשימה.

"הסרט הזה מדגיש כמה נורא היה להיות חריג בשנות קדם המדינה. אלכסנדר מן היה קומוניסט, ולמרות שהממסד הספרותי העריך את כשרונו, בשנת 1935 הוא הוצא רשמית מאגודת הסופרים העבריים, הוחרם, וכשהיו משמיעים את שיריו אמרו ברדיו "מלים עממיות". וכל זה בגלל אינטרפרטציה מוטעית ל'פואימה לשלום' שכתב." דחדו מציין שהיחס הטוטאליטארי כלפי מי שלא נחשב ל"אנשינו" על ידי בן גוריון, הופנה גם לאנשי הימין, בראש ובראשונה אורי צבי גרינברג. ראינו את הסרט התיעודי בהקרנה מיוחדת לפני עריכתו הסופית .

Purim – celebrating Jewish unity

Rabbi Zushe Silberstein

This past Sunday in most parts of the world we celebrated the festive yom tov of Purim. Although Purim tells of past events, its message is current.

The Mishnah in tractate Megillah says, Hakore et Hameguila Lemafre'a, he who reads the Megillah backwards has not fulfilled the mitzvah of Megillah reading. The simple meaning is that if one reads the story of the Megillah from the end to beginning, then he has not accomplished the mitzvah. Chassidic teaching suggests a deeper meaning: when one reads the Megillah backwards, as if it is a backward or old story, not a current message, then he has missed the point of the Megillah reading.

The Megillah relates that Haman phrased his request to kill the Jews as follows: "There is one nation scattered and dispersed among the peoples... and it is not to the benefit of the king to tolerate them." The rabbis explain that the mention of the term "the king" here is an allusion to God, King of kings.

Haman thought he could destroy the Jewish People because they were "scattered and dispersed." Instead of joining together in bonds of oneness, our people had separated themselves from each other. This distance was what caused God to contemplate their destruction.

For that reason, when Esther told Mordechai that she would approach Achashverosh to plead for the Jewish People, she instructed him: "Go and bring together all the Jews." Until this was done, there was no point in her approaching the king. Only when unity was restored was there hope that her mission could meet with success.

This is not just a story of the past. On the contrary, our observance of the Purim holiday should be with the intent of reliving, not merely remembering, the events of those days. Jewish unity is therefore intrinsically bound up with our commemoration of the holiday. Two of the mitzvot connected with Purim – mishloach manot (gifts of food to friends) and matanot l'evyonim (charitable gifts to the poor) – are clear expressions of the bonds of oneness that bring our people together.

Our sages teach us that in the ultimate future, all the festivals will be nullified except for Purim and Chanukah. The rabbis explain that the intent is not that we will cease observing the other holidays, but that they will no longer stand out as prominent days.

In the era of Redemption, the revelation of Godliness will be an ongoing aspect of existence, and the festivals will not be unique. They will be observed and all their laws will be kept, but the spiritual nature of the days will not stand out as special compared to the constant revelation that will characterize that era.

But, even within this setting of revealed Godliness, Purim will be special. Not only will we observe the laws of the holiday, its unique spiritual significance will stand out.

The same applies with regard to the experience of Jewish unity on Purim. The era of Redemption will be characterized by unity and oneness. Nevertheless, even in such a setting, the oneness our people experience on Purim will stand out.

Rabbi Zushe Silberstein is the spiritual leader of Chabad Chabanel – Maison Belfield and a Quebec prisons chaplain in Montreal.

Abraham Lincoln and the Jews

At the outbreak of the American Civil War, approximately 150,000 Jews lived in the United States. Seven thousand of them served on the Union side, and 3,000 in the ranks of the Confederacy.

President Abraham Lincoln's attitude toward Jews must be measured, in part at least, by his opinion of the "Know-Nothing" movement. The overwhelming majority of Jews were immigrants and included in the general Know-Nothing classification of unwanted aliens.

In 1855, Lincoln wrote, "I am not a Know-Nothing... How could I be? How could anyone who abhors the oppression of negroes be in favour of degrading classes of white people? Our progress in degeneracy appears to be pretty rapid. As a nation, we began by declaring that all men are created equal. We now practically read it, 'All men are created equal except negroes and foreigners and Catholics.'"

October 1861 was a bad time for the North. The Union Army was in the doldrums over military defeats. Yet, in the midst of burdensome problems, Lincoln found time to consider the small matter of Jewish chaplains. He understood the vital principle that was at stake. At his request, a bill was introduced and quickly passed authorizing the army not to exclude from the chaplaincy a regularly ordained minister of any religion.

All during the war there was an invisible second front. This was an economic war of greed and exploitation. Unprincipled merchants took advantage of the needs of both sides and fattened on the profits. From such a pattern of confusion, nothing but anarchy could result.

Bookmarks

It was in the midst of this chaos of profiteering and indecision that the most sweeping anti-Jewish regulation in American history was issued in 1862 from Gen. Ulysses S. Grant's headquarters. It provided for the expulsion within 24 hours of all the Jews as a class without trial or hearing from the general area known as the "Department of the Tennessee."

Although relatively few people were involved, this order became a minor sensation of the entire war. In the face of a general outcry, Lincoln quickly wrote a note to the general-in-chief of the army directing him to telegraph instructions for the cancellation of the order.

In later years, the mystery of Grant's notorious order was never cleared up. Grant denied responsibility. But, whether viewed as a grave mistake or a bad joke, Lincoln did not hesitate to quickly rectify a grievous wrong.

Two hundred and three years after his birth, wherein lies Lincoln's uniqueness? Why do men and women reverently refer to him as "Father Abraham"? Perhaps, because of him the world sees itself reflected. The triumph and the tragedy of living are mirrored in his image. The great virtues and achievements of Lincoln – his humour, his humanity, his understanding, the emancipation of the slaves and the preservation of the Union – are an imperishable part of history. But beyond all this, Lincoln achieved something even more precious and enduring – the creation of a noble personality. A human being of such profound sympathy and understanding that the world loves him not only for what he did but also for what he was.

PURIM AT NETIVOT HATORAH: After months of planning and creating, the students transformed the lobby and second floor of Netivot HaTorah Day School into a "Megillah around the World" depicting scenes from the Book of Esther taking place in different countries. Seen with art teacher Rochelle Diamond are the b'not sherut, Israeli girls who come to work at the school for a year as part of their national service and helped the kids with this project. From left are Lior Luzon, Or Dugma, Avigail Cohen, Rochelle Diamond and Ayelet Wolf.

PURIM SCENE: In honour of Purim, Harbord Bakery and Calandria is displaying a 1910 puppet stage with circa-1940 marionettes in a diorama of the Purim story, as retold by the Yiddish poet Itsik Manger. In his retelling, Manger created a young lover for the soon-to-be Queen Esther, as well as a new take on Haman, modelled on a Czech farmer who betrayed three families of Jews in hiding. (Harbord Bakery photo)

Married for 70 years, couple is on permanent vacation

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

After 70 years, Shirley and Hy Rabinovitch, both natives of Montreal, still remember their honeymoon fondly.

"Hy was in the air force, and he had an 18-hour pass to get married. I wore blue because I was a war bride," said Shirley, 90.

The couple, who have three children, nine grandchildren and one great-grandchild, and now live in Toronto, married two years after meeting at an AZA party in Montreal. "I think I liked him right away," Shirley said.

Shirley and Hy Rabinovitch, today, and at their wedding 70 years ago, below.

"We got married March 6, and there was a huge snowstorm," said Hy, 91. "We had no way of getting to the synagogue, but my friend managed to get his car out of the garage, and he drove us. It took until 10 p.m. to have the ceremony because of all the snow."

Shirley said they packed a lot into their short honeymoon. "We stayed at the Ritz Carlton, went to the El Morocco restaurant and night club, and saw Casablanca. Then Hy went back to the air force and I went back to my mother's house. As Time Goes By [from Casablanca] is still our song."

In an interview at their retirement home, Hy, with his hand constantly on his wife's shoulder, said there is no secret to their long marriage. "We just live. We take one day and then we take the next day. No matter what happens, we have to persevere. We don't fight much, we just correct each other.

"We always have a positive attitude and believe that things have a way of working out. I do say, though, that marriage needs a foundation. Most divorces come about because of money or infidelity. Make sure you can sustain yourself before you get married."

Life is different now compared to when they got married, Shirley said. "We were vagabonds. I followed Hy to Ottawa, Quebec and St. Thomas, [Ont.] while he was an air frame mechanic in the air force. We lived out of a suitcase and I got a job wherever we were.

Laughing, she said that Hy wanted to marry her because he got paid $1.35 per day more once he was married.

They travelled extensively throughout their marriage – Hy had a car dealership and then went into real estate – and visited Israel numerous times.

"We once motored from Hungary to Paris," said Hy, who still drives.

Just recently, they travelled to their granddaughter's destination wedding in Tuscany.

Retirement home living is like being on a permanent vacation, Shirley said. "After dinner, I feel like I have to put my coat on and go home. I still feel as if we've been out for dinner."

Hy said "there's nothing wrong with life in the retirement home. The alternative is much worse."

They then cut the conversation short, because their grandson, a Bialik Day School student, was in a Purim performance at their residence and they couldn't miss it.

Could Arab culture prevent two-state compromise?

In a Feb. 11 National Post opinion piece headlined "The peace paradox," Clifford May of the Foundation for the Defense of Democracies wrote about his meeting with Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Salam Fayyad and the prospects for Israeli-Palestinian peace. May argued that Fayyad is the sort of moderate, pragmatic Palestinian leader with whom Israelis could reach an agreement if they could negotiate with him and if Fayyad "could deliver a majority of Palestinians willing to accept a compromise solution to the conflict."

May put the chance of achieving such a deal with Fayyad at "[r]oughly zero to none," but he attributed that mostly to constraints related to Fayyad's unelected and unrepresentative status among the Palestinian people and the PLO. May also noted that Fayyad acknowledged that with the Palestinians split between the West Bank under Fatah and Gaza under Hamas, talk of peace is all the more remote – especially given Hamas' declared threat to destroy Israel.

What May did not mention is what's arguably central to the failure of all previous peace-making efforts (including Camp David in 2000 and Annapolis in 2008): the refusal of the Palestinian leadership "to accept a compromise solution."

Indeed, it's strange that May should have even felt the need to refer to a "compromise solution" as if to imply that there's any other type. After all, peace talks (and negotiations in general) depend upon both sides being able and willing to compromise. So it's redundant to even use the word "compromise" in this context. Or at least it should be.

Yet, the word seems to be increasingly cropping up these days in the very context of Israel-Palestinian peace-making. To cite just one other example, in a Jan. 31 American Interest blog entry ("Peace Process Sputters at the Starting Line"), Walter Russell Mead reflected on Hamas' firm denial of a report in the Saudi Arabian newspaper Al-Sharq that Hamas leader Khaled Meshal was prepared to endorse a two-state solution based on the 1967 borders. (Although this received a fair amount of attention, it's not the first time such a claim has been made about Hamas.)

The denial led to further discord between Fatah and Hamas, giving Mead pause to write: "And so we're back to square one." But he also used the occasion to make the following observation about Israel: "The substantial majority of Israelis who want a two-state solution (with some caveats) don't have much of an agenda to push in the absence of a strong Palestinian partner who is both willing to accept and able to deliver a compromise peace" (emphasis added).

Again, is there any other form of peace than one based on compromise? So why the need here, as in the May piece, to mention it?

It's not sloppy writing that leads to such an obvious redundancy. There must be something else at issue. And, arguably, it's that the concept of compromise appears exceptional not only for Palestinian politics, but for Arab political culture more generally.

Mark Lavie, a veteran foreign correspondent currently based in Egypt, reflected on the importance of this phenomenon in a December dispatch from Cairo. Compromise, Lavie wrote, "is the key ingredient of democracy. Yet the lack of the ability to compromise is evident all around us here in Egypt. It has kept the diverse and squabbling opposition groups from uniting. And in the current crisis, it has made it impossible to negotiate."

Other observers, such as former Canadian ambassador Michael Bell, have offered similar thoughts. Indeed this column cited Bell last December when, in a Globe and Mail opinion column about the political crisis in Egypt, he pointed to "long-held political and social traditions, where the art of political compromise remains rudimentary, if not alien, to the majority."

Lavie went one step further, however, noting that there "is no word for 'compromise' in Arabic."

This is not to say that compromise as it's understood in the West is impossible in the Arab world, rather, that it's very difficult – something that's not lost on Israelis themselves.

Margit Schonberger ז"ל

It is with sadness that we announce the passing of Margit Schonberger on Monday, February 11, 2013. She is survived and will be greatly missed by her children: Rachel and George Mason; and Rabbi Joseph and Susan Schonberger. She will also be greatly missed by her grandchildren, Andrew and Rachel Mason, Lori and Jack Hurtig, Eliana Kayla and Samuel Oren Schonberger. She was the proud great-grandmother of Bailey Leah Hurtig and Noah David Mason. She will also be greatly missed by her sister Anna Farkas, and sister and brother-in-law Clara and Joe Bisztric. Mrs. Schonberger was predeceased by her loving husband, Dezso Moshe Schonberger, to whom she was married for 66 years. She missed him terribly. She was predeceased by her loving grandson David Zev Schonberger, brother-in-law Carl Stewart, sister and-brother-in-law Magda and Leslie Trattner, brother-in-law Bernard Farkas, sister Boske Hidvegi, parents Cecilia and Joseph Kelemen. Mrs. Schonberger was a Holocaust survivor who dedicated her life to the happiness of her family. She was a talented homemaker, cook, baker, and seamstress. She enjoyed crocheting, and even made a dozen beautiful kippot for the entire wedding party when her first grandchild got married. She made a special point of remembering and baking the favourites of each of her loved ones when they came for a visit. She was a giving and kind person who had a profound love for her children, grandchildren and great grandchildren. There was never a shortage of food, cake, presents, hugs or kisses in her home. She will be greatly missed by her family and friends. Funeral Service was held at Steeles Memorial Chapel, 2 P.M. Internment took place at Mount Sinai Cemetery, Pride of Israel Section. Shiva was observed at AMICA of Thornhill, 546 Steeles Ave. West Donations in Margit's memory can be made to Beit Halochem of Canada, 1600 Steeles Ave. West, Concord Ontario Canada, L4K 4M2.

Saskatchewan suddenly sprouts rabbis

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Two years ago, Saskatchewan was a wasteland for Jews seeking the services of rabbis, but that's no longer the case. The province's Jewish communities – largely in Saskatoon and Regina – now have three rabbis and a fourth on the way.

The first to arrive on the scene was Chabad Rabbi Raphael Kats – who established Saskatchewan's first Chabad presence in Saskatoon in June 2011. "The community has been fantastic, wonderful," said Rabbi Kats, who also serves Regina's Jewish community. "People have been extremely generous."

Rabbi Claudio Jodorkovsky

Rabbi Kats said he and his wife, Sarah, have been hosting holiday gatherings and offering classes. "We launched summer camps in Saskatoon and Regina last year," he added.

Rabbi Kats estimates that Saskatoon has an affiliated Jewish community of about 200 families. There are two congregations – Congregation Agudas Israel, a Conservative shul, and Congregation Shir Chadash. The latter is a smaller group that broke away from the former about a dozen years ago.

"We are also seeing more and more Jews attending our programs who are not affiliated with the community," Rabbi Kats said.

He added that there are plans to have a full-time Chabad rabbi setup in Regina in the next few months.

Rabbi Jeremy Parnes

For the past several years, Saskatoon's Agudas Israel had been led by Cantor Neil Schwartz. Last year, rather than renewing Schwartz's contract, the congregation recruited South American Rabbi Claudio Jodorkovsky. He and his wife, Rosy, and children, Amiel, 8, and Yoel, 5, arrived in Saskatoon last August.

Rabbi Raphael Kats

Rabbi Jodorkovsky received his smichah in 2002 from the Latin American Rabbinical Seminary of the Conservative Movement, the Jewish Theological Seminary's Buenos Aires branch. He has a BA in the management of non-profit organizations and studied for an MA in Jewish education, and he participated in the seniors educators program at the Melton Center at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

The Santiago native said that he heard the calling to the rabbinate when he was a teenager. "I come from a traditional family. We were always involved with our synagogue," he said. "My father was executive director for 30 years and I was a youth leader. I was also close to our rabbi."

After receiving his smichah, Rabbi Jodorkovsky took a position in Medellin, Colombia. He spent two years there and another seven leading a congregation in Bogota, Colombia's capital city. Bogota has a Jewish community of about 4,000, he said.

Despite reports in the media about Colombia and its ongoing guerilla war (which seems to be coming to an end) and drug gangs, Rabbi Jodorkovsky describes Colombia as a great country. "In the city, you didn't see any sign of the wars," he said. "Delinquency was a problem, but it's the same everywhere in South America."

Rabbi Jodorkovsky said he and his wife decided to come to Canada – and Saskatoon – because they were looking for a better quality of life for their children. "We really like Canada," he said. "And a rabbi in a small shul can have an impact on everybody in the community."

He said that Agudas Israel has a membership of about 100 families, but added that Saskatoon is growing fast. "The city's population is expected to double within 10 years," Rabbi Jodorkovsky said. "We expect that the Jewish population will also increase, and we are seeing that happening already. The university also attracts Jewish students from elsewhere."

Although Rabbi Jeremy Parnes has been the rabbi at Regina's Beth Jacob Synagogue for just little more than a year, his connection with the congregation goes back nearly 30 years.

Rabbi Parnes, 61, hails from London, England. He was raised in an Orthodox home, sang in a synagogue choir and attended a Jewish boarding school. He came to Canada 35 years ago with the company he was working for. He lived first in Toronto, then six years in London, Ont. He was transferred to Regina 28 years ago and left the company soon after. He has been involved in a number of different business ventures over the years.

Fourteen years ago, Rabbi Parnes found himself in the position of acting prayer leader at Beth Jacob in Regina after the rabbi moved to New York. "We struck a search committee to recruit a new rabbi," he said. "The board asked me to lead services on a half-time basis until they could find a new rabbi. After a couple of years, they stopped looking."

While his position was initially half time, it soon morphed into a full-time job. "I had learned to lead services from the previous rabbi and I learned to read the Haftorah," Rabbi Parnes said. "I am still learning to read Torah."

Seeking guidance in his role as lay leader, he turned to Rabbi Alan Green, the spiritual leader of the Shaarey Zedek Congregation in Winnipeg. Rabbi Green encouraged him to study for the rabbinate. Following Rabbi Green's suggestion, he looked into the Jewish Renewal movement, which was co-founded by Rabbi Zalman Schachter-Shalomi and which Rabbi Green is part of.

"I went to a retreat and found myself feeling right at home," Rabbi Parnes recalls. "I joined the ordination program."

That was eight years ago.

He said the Renewal ordination program consists of the study of Talmud, Torah, Agudah, history and elements of Kabbalah. "I found it all amazing and enlightening," he said. "I was exposed to a deeper level of Torah than I ever experienced before."

Rabbi Parnes trained via long distance as well as through regular attendance at retreats such as Smichah Week, which he compared to being in a yeshiva.

"My community was very supportive," he said. "One couple in our congregation established a rabbinic endowment fund to help cover the costs of my rabbinic training. It is not an inexpensive process."

He received his smichah as a rabbi from Jewish Renewal movement in January 2012

"There is still money left in the endowment fund, which is available for others in our congregation who want to study to be able to help lead services," he said.

Beth Jacob has a membership of 95 families. (Regina also has a Reform Congregation – Temple Beth Tikvah – which was founded in 1990.) Like Rabbi Jodorkovsky, Rabbi Parnes said that his community's Jewish population is growing, thanks to an influx of Israelis.

"We have a lot going on here at the shul," he said. "More and more, Beth Jacob is becoming once again the centre for Jewish life in Regina."

'CHAG SAME'ACH from YITZ'S

Israeli group fights terror in courts worldwide

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Fighting terrorism through litigation may seem like an impossible task, but one Israeli organization is doing just that in courts around the world.

The Shurat HaDin Israel Law Center, with a staff of 13, including 11 lawyers, partners with law firms around the world to fight for justice and compensation for victims of terror. Based in Tel Aviv, the non-profit organization works with a network of volunteer lawyers to file legal actions on behalf of survivors.

Its director, Nitsana Darshan-Leitner spoke to members of Ottawa's Bora Laskin Law Society Feb. 11 at the Soloway Jewish Community Centre. Her talk described some of the cases the centre has worked on, as well as the detective work involved in discovering the assets of terror groups and regimes around the world, and the intense legal research used to unearth ways to sue in various countries and jurisdictions.

One example she cited was the halting of the second Gaza flotilla.

"The first flotilla was a big success for the organizers, so they tried to do it again the next year, bigger and better," she said, referring to Israel's May 2010 interception of six ships headed to the blockaded coastal territory. Israel's raid on one of the vessels, the Mavi Marmara, drew widespread condemnation after nine of its passengers were killed.

"We decided that all boats need maritime insurance, so we contacted all the maritime insurance companies in the world and told them they would be aiding and abetting terrorism, because the end goal of the boats was to help Hamas which is a designated terrorist organization. Lloyds of London then refused to insure the boats... and six boats pulled out due to lack of insurance."

Nitsana Darshan-Leitner

After using the same tactics with satellite communications companies, Shurat HaDin hired a law firm in Greece that alerted Greek maritime officials to check all the boats to make sure they had insurance and satellite communication equipment and were fit to sail. The result was the cancellation of the flotilla.

The organization has also managed to freeze terrorists' bank accounts around the world and has won judgments on behalf of terror victims and seizing assets, including real estate in the United States and Europe.

"Every day we get more and more calls from more and more terror victims who want to fight back," Darshan-Leitner said.

"Governments cannot do what we do. Governments cannot file lawsuits against other governments, against banks... We are private lawyers who represent private people. We have a goal to bankrupt terrorism, one lawsuit at a time."

"This is a war, and we are fighting for our national survival, and I promise you that at the end of the road, between them and us, we will be the ones who will win."

Darshan-Leitner impressed the room full of mostly lawyers, which included former deputy prime minister Herb Gray and Liberal MP Irwin Cotler.

"To hear Nitsana Darshan-Leitner talk about the tactics and ideas that she and her fellow counsel have come up with to hunt down terrorist funds, complicit banks and complicit governments is nothing short of incredible... her methods are sheer brilliance," said lawyer Russ Molot, adding that he'd "love to be of assistance to Shurat HaDin here in Canada and am talking with others of a like mind."

The founder of the Bora Laskin Society, Cory Olishansky, worked with the Embassy of Israel to bring Darshan-Leitner to Ottawa on the recommendation of society member Maya Weiss.

'A friend of the community'

In that 2007 open letter published in Quebec newspapers, he apologized for other egregious faults, including the church's handling of the sexual abuse of children and attitudes to minorities and women.

"I recognize the narrow-minded attitudes of certain Catholics, before 1960, that favoured antisemitism, racism, indifference towards First Nations and discrimination against women and homosexuals," he wrote. He called on the faithful to publicly repent for these past mistakes during the Christian season of Lent.

"Our Judeo-Christian tradition has made us a people who stand together and are charitable. We know how to help each other and we are capable of forgiveness with the help of God."

Then-CJC Quebec chair Victor Goldbloom, a pioneer in interfaith dialogue, welcomed Cardinal Ouellet's forthrightness and said it was in keeping with his past efforts to nurture a relationship with the Jewish community.

"He is a friend of the community, for whom I have a great deal of esteem," said Goldbloom in 2007. "He is certainly an open-minded and positive person, and I think [the letter] will have an influence on Canadian Catholics."

Goldbloom, a past president of both the Canadian and international Council of Christians and Jews, said last week that he continues to regard Ouellet, 68, as a beacon for dialogue and reconciliation. He would consider it good news if the Quebec cleric is chosen to succeed to Pope Benedict XVI.

"Cardinal Ouellet has been very positive on Catholic-Jewish relations and my contacts with him over the years have shown he is very supportive of dialogue," Goldbloom said.

He recalled that Cardinal Ouellet wanted to start formal dialogue with the Quebec City Jewish community, but perhaps because it is so small, that was never realized.

Although Cardinal Ouellet is regarded as a staunch conservative, Goldbloom said, "My intuition tells me that, if he is elected, we will see a continuation of the positive relations that now go back to John XXIII [1958-63]."

The German Pope Benedict, who steps down at the end of the month, is also viewed as conservative, yet has been supportive of Christian-Jewish relations, Goldbloom pointed out.

Pope Benedict did, however, make a couple of decisions that have shaken the Jewish community's confidence in that commitment, Goldbloom acknowledged. These include his revoking of the excommunication of British-born Bishop Richard Williamson, who has denied aspects of the Holocaust, and the restoring of the Latin Mass with its prayer for the conversion of the Jews.

"This is the kind of paradox we could have with Cardinal Ouellet, but, on balance, I look back at Benedict's papacy with a positive feeling," Goldbloom said.

In October, Goldbloom became one of the few non-Christians to be made a papal knight, a rare honour conferred by the pontiff.

Since 2010, Cardinal Ouellet, who is from the Abitibi region, has been the prefect of the Congregation for Bishops and president of the Pontifical Commission for Latin America, residing in Rome. He has been a cardinal since 2003.

Whether a candidate or not, Cardinal Ouellet is among those in the upper echelons who will be voting for the next pope.

In a 2010 interview published in the National Post, he expressed the opinion that the Second Vatican Council has been interpreted too liberally by many Catholics. But he also observed, "After the council, the sense of mission was replaced by the idea of dialogue, that we should dialogue with other faiths and not attempt to bring them to the Gospels, to convert them."

Israel's effort to mend ties with Turkey fails

The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — An Israeli-initiated effort to heal ties with Turkey, which saw Israeli officials meet their Turkish counterparts in Rome three weeks ago, ended in failure.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's national security adviser, Yaakov Amidror, accompanied by former Foreign Ministry director general Joseph Ciechanover, held talks in the Italian capital with Turkish Foreign Ministry Director Feridun Sinirlioglu, to try to formulate terms for easing the rift between the two countries that has strained relations over the past three years.

But the contacts did not produce a breakthrough, Channel 2 reported Feb. 23, and the Israelis came home empty-handed.

Hatnua Leader Tzipi Livni made her own effort to ease the strains by seeking a meeting in New York late last year with Turkey's Foreign Minister Ahmet Davutoglu, but he refused to see her, the news report said.

It added that Israel is feeling the pressure to mend the rift ahead of U.S. President Barack Obama's visit here next month and that Livni's decision to join Netanyahu's nascent coalition might make the task easier. Obama is said to have urged both sides privately to heal their ties.

Similar talks took place in Geneva in November.

Israel has reportedly been prepared to apologize to Turkey for "operational errors" during its fatal raid on a May 2010 Turkish aid flotilla to Gaza.

As a condition to normalizing diplomatic ties with Israel, Turkey has demanded that Israel apologize for the death of nine activists who were killed when Israeli commandos raided the Mavi Marmara ship during a takeover operation in the Mediterranean.

The aid ship, chartered by the Islamist IHH organization, was headed to the Gaza Strip in defiance of Israel's naval siege on the Hamas-run area.

Turkey has also demanded Israel lift the siege, but is prepared to drop that demand, a report in Turkey's Radikal said last week.

Yaakov Amidror

Israel is prepared to offer compensation to the families of those killed, according to the report.

Such a deal was reportedly under consideration in the summer of 2011, but was scuttled in part because of objections by then-foreign minister Avigdor Liberman. Now facing trial on corruption charges, Liberman is no longer in government.

In related news, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu reportedly rejected an offer by Defence Minister Ehud Barak to write an apology to Barak's Turkish counterpart for possible "operational errors" that took place when the IDF raided the Gaza-bound Mavi Marmara in May 2010.

The Israeli daily Ha'aretz, citing unnamed Foreign Ministry sources, reported Sunday that Barak, who has advocated an apology since the incident, came forward with the proposal to try to repair the two countries' frayed relations after the elections, but that Netanyahu opposed it.

Prisoner's death sparks Palestinian protests

The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas lashed out at Israel Monday, accusing it of killing Palestinian children hours after a funeral of a Palestinian who died while in Israeli custody.

Violence broke out at a number of spots around the West Bank Monday as thousands gathered in Hebron for the funeral of Arafat Jaradat, who the Palestinians say was tortured to death by Israel. Israel says the inmate died of a heart attack.

"Israel is killing our children with live fire," Abbas said during an address in Ramallah, adding that he won't let Palestinians waste away in Israeli jails.

His words come as Israel has called on the Palestinians to calm the West Bank in the face of what Jerusalem fears could be a widespread outbreak of violence or third intifadah.

Abbas accused Israel of creating the tension, but said the Palestinians would not allow it to get out of hand.

"We won't let Israel create chaos in the West Bank," he said. "We won't let that happen."

Earlier in the day, some 25,000 mourners escorted Jaradat's body from a Hebron hospital to a cemetery in his home village of Si'ir.

Riots were reported in the village of Beit Anoun, between Si'ir and Hebron, just before noon, where some 200 Palestinians gathered, Israel Radio reported.

Protests were also reported outside Ramallah and near the Ofer military prison, where hundreds threw rocks at Israeli security forces.

Forces also clashed with Palestinians at other spots around the West Bank, including Tulkarem and near Tekoa.

Officials had been on high alert, expecting another day of wide-ranging unrest centred around the funeral. Some Palestinians called for Monday to be a "day of rage" on the Palestinian street.

The army said it would expend every effort not to worsen the situation and let Palestinian security forces take control where possible.

Last Friday, Palestinian protesters reportedly fired flares and hurled stones at Israeli troops in the Old City in Jerusalem amid violent protests in the West Bank.

Several dozen Palestinians began hurling rocks at troops stationed outside the Mugrabi Gate after Friday prayers, Ynet reported.

When the troops pursued the men into the Temple Mount compound, other men fired flares at them. None of the Israeli soldiers was injured.

The Temple Mount, the site of Judaism's ancient temple that overlooks the Western Wall, is home to two mosques considered among the most holy in Islam. Clashes there have sparked extended conflict in the past.

Meanwhile, riots broke out in Hebron as dozens began to march in the direction of Beit Hadassah, an area inhabited by Israeli settlers. Protesters also hurled stones outside Ofer Prison near Jerusalem, where dozens of Palestinians prisoners are held, some under administrative detention.

The protests, according to Ynet, were over the detention of Samer Tareq al-Essawi, Ja'far Ibrahim 'Izz-al-Din and Tareq Husein Qa'dan and Ayman Isma'il Sharawna.

Ynet quoted unnamed officials in Israel's Shin Bet, as saying that Sharawna and Essawi were released along with 1,025 in 2011 in exchange for Gilad Schalit, a soldier abducted by Hamas, but "returned to practice terrorism."

Monday was the 19th anniversary of the murder by Baruch Goldstein of 29 Muslim worshippers and the wounding of 125 others during a prayer service in a mosque at the Cave of the Patriarchs. Activists had planned a series of events distinct from the funeral to commemorate the shooting.

Under interim Israeli-Palestinian agreements implemented in 1997, Israel pulled out of 80 per cent of Hebron, where some 120,000 Palestinians live, retaining control of the remaining 20 per cent, where some 30,000 Palestinians live and where several Jewish settler enclaves are home to a population of some 700.

On Sunday, the PA said it had determined Jaradat was tortured to death in Megiddo Prison after his arrest last week, while Israel said that the prisoner died of a heart attack and that signs of trauma on his body were from resuscitation attempts.

The Palestinian announcement was expected to further escalate the tense situation in the territories, which some have already described as marking the beginning of a third intifadah.

Several thousand Palestinian prisoners held by Israel observed a one-day fast Sunday to protest Jaradat's death. On Monday morning, in Megiddo Prison, more than 1,000 Palestinian prisoners again refused food.

Israel and Canada conduct joint naval exercise

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The Canadian and Israeli navies conducted joint rescue and maneuvering exercises in the Gulf of Aqaba on Feb. 7.

Crews from the HMCS Toronto and the INS Kidon took part in a search-and-rescue and passing exercise – called "SAREX" in naval jargon – as well as an exchange of sailors as part of the manoeuvres.

Brig.-Gen. (Res.) Eden Attias, Israeli Ministry of Defence attaché to Canada told The CJN that the joint operation was another "significant step in our bourgeoning bilateral ties."

"As one of the first concrete achievements to come out of the 2011 memorandum of understanding on defence relations, the exercise was the result of nearly six months of co-ordination," Attias said in an email.

Two years ago in Jerusalem, Canadian Defence Minister Peter MacKay and his Israeli counterpart, Ehud Barak, signed a memorandum of understanding on military relations.

"The security of both Israelis and Canadians is strengthened when our militaries work together sharing in experience and expertise," Attias said.

An account of the joint military exercise was published on the Department of National Defence's (DND) website on Feb. 21.

According to the DND, five Canadian sailors were sent to observe on the Kidon, while Israel sent seven sailors to the Toronto.

"These exchanges are a very important way for navies to interact with one another. It gives excellent insight into the operating procedures of allies so that when they are called on to work together in an operational capacity, they are aware of what is happening on the other vessel and they know what to expect," the department said.

Sub-Lieut. Drew MacLeod, one of the five Canadian seamen sent aboard the Israeli vessel, was quoted in the report as saying he was amazed at how "the language of warfare" transcends cultures.

"It was also nice to have the opportunity to have lunch with them and get a taste of Israel," he said.

HMCS Toronto's commanding officer, Cmdr. David Patchell, reported that the joint exercise was "an exceptional opportunity to work with our friends in the Israeli Navy, sharing ideas and medical procedures that can benefit both countries."

He complimented his Israeli counterparts, calling them "extremely professional and welcoming in working with Toronto."

Galloway refuses to debate Israeli

The Times of Israel

LONDON — British MP George Galloway quit a debate on Israel at Oxford University last week after discovering that his opponent was an Israeli citizen.

The Respect party legislator, who is renowned for being staunchly pro-Palestinian, stormed out of the building saying: "I don't recognize Israel and I don't debate with Israelis."

Galloway was first to speak in the debate, opining in favour of the statement "Israel should withdraw immediately from the West Bank" for 10 minutes. But midway into his opponent's address, in which the third-year student referred repeatedly to Israel as "we" and "us," Galloway inquired whether the speaker, Eylon Aslan-Levy, was Israeli. Upon learning that he was, the MP stormed out of the building with his wife, claiming that he was misled.

"I refused this evening to debate with an Israeli, a supporter of the Apartheid state of Israel," Galloway said in a statement late on Feb. 20. "The reason is simple; No recognition, No normalization. Just Boycott, divestment and sanctions, until the apartheid state is defeated."

British MP George Galloway

Aslan-Levy, 21, who has joint British-Israeli citizenship, described Galloway's remarks as "appalling."

"It's deeply offensive to refuse to speak to someone because of their nationality. It's pure racism," he said in an interview to the Times. "The fact that a sitting member of Parliament could do this is all the more astonishing."

Speaking to a university newspaper, debate organizer Mahmood Naji condemned Galloway's walkout and denied misleading him.

"At no point during my email exchange with Mr. Galloway's secretary was Eylon's nationality ever brought up or mentioned," he said, "nor do I expect to have to tell the speaker what his opponent's nationality is."

Galloway has long been a bitter critic of Israel. He accepted an honorary Palestinian passport from Hamas prime minister Ismail Haniyeh three years ago after organizing aid trips to Gaza. He has reportedly described Jerusalem and Baghdad as being "raped" by "foreigners," claimed Zionists control the British media, and blamed Israel for the assassination of Lebanese prime minister Rafiq Hariri.

In 2010, Galloway was denied entry to Canada on national security grounds over his links to Hamas, though he was later permitted to visit.

Last March he won the Bradford West seat in northern England — a district that includes a large Muslim community — with a majority of more than 10,000 votes.

Bomb plot exposed in London

Miriam Shaviv
The Times of Israel

LONDON — Three men were found guilty Feb. 21 of planning a "spectacular bombing campaign" in the United Kingdom, including an attack on a synagogue.

Irfan Naseer, 31, Irfan Khalid, 27, and Ashik Ali, 27, wanted to carry out "another 9/11" by using eight suicide bombers armed with guns and explosives-filled backpacks to target "crowded places" in their native city of Birmingham, Woolwich Crown Court found.

The trio had not decided on a specific target, but in conversations secretly recorded by police, Naseer said that even if the group could not make a bomb, it could "get guns, yeah, from the black geezers, Africans, and charge in some like synagogue or charge in different places."

Two of the men, Naseer and Khalid, travelled to Pakistan twice for training, including a two-month stint at an Al Qaeda facility. They recorded martyrdom videos before returning to the United Kingdom in 2011, where they recruited Ali and experimented together in building bombs.

Naseer also helped send four other men to Pakistan for training and recruited two others for his own plot. All six have already pleaded guilty to related terrorism charges.

In addition to 12 counts of preparing acts of terrorism between December 2010 and September 2011, Naseer, Khalid and Ali were convicted of raising money for terrorism and recruiting others for a terror act.

The Community Security Trust, a charity that monitors antisemitism and provides security for the Jewish community in Britain, welcomed the guilty verdict, but said the plot "is yet another disturbing example of would-be antisemitic terrorism here in Britain. This is the third recent case in which terrorists have contemplated British Jews amongst other U.K. targets, the others being an Al Qaeda plot of 2011 and the stock-exchange plot of 2010.

"Worse still, it follows last year's Khans case, in which a married couple solely targeted the Jewish community of North Manchester," the Community Security Trust said.

"In Britain, terrorism threatens all of society. We are all at equal risk when using public places, such as transport hubs or famous buildings, but these cases demonstrate that British Jews face an additional level of threat, due to the sheer number of terrorists who regard Jews as amongst the priority targets for their actions."

Sentencing will take place in April or May. The judge has already warned the men they face life in prison.

Most British Jews live in London: statistics

JTA

LONDON — Britain's Jewish population is becoming more concentrated, with nearly 60 per cent of Jews living in London, new statistics show.

According to detailed figures from the 2011 census released this week, 90 per cent of the country's 263,000 Jews live in just 20 per cent of the city's neighbourhoods.

The most heavily Jewish area is the Orthodox suburb of Golders Green in northwest London, with 7,661 Jews, a growth of 35 per cent since the last census in 2001.

"This concentration into relatively few places often gives rise to the perception that there is a greater Jewish presence in Britain than is actually the case," said David Graham of the Institute for Jewish Policy Research. "Nationally, Jews comprise just 0.5 per cent of the population, but at the local level that proportion rises to as much as 40 per cent in some places."

He said that many of the areas that are growing fastest are haredi neighbourhoods in London and Manchester, buoyed by high birth rates. Another trend is for Jews to move farther out of "the crowded and congested" capital to the "greener, more spacious surroundings" of Greater London.

Partially as a result, some previously dominant areas such as Redbridge in northeast London are showing considerable decline, leaving some schools and shuls struggling to fill places.

The full set of census data will continue to be released in stages throughout 2013 and 2014 and will be used to inform planning in the community.

Non-Orthodox rabbis still fighting for equal pay

Ben Sales
JTA

TEL AVIV — In a precedent setting decision, Israel's Supreme Court ruled last May that a Reform Rabbi, Miri Gold, should be paid a state salary, just like her Orthodox colleagues.

The Reform and Conservative movements hailed the decision as a step closer to full equality for non-Orthodox religious denominations.

But Rabbi Gold, who works as a rabbi at Kibbutz Gezer in central Israel, still has yet to see her first government paycheck.

The government says Rabbi Gold has not fulfilled the criteria set by the state for non-Orthodox rabbis. Rabbi Gold and her allies say the criteria are onerous and unfairly set different conditions for Orthodox and non-Orthodox rabbis.

In a bid to challenge the rules, Rabbi Gold, another non-Orthodox Israeli rabbi, and the Conservative and Reform movements filed a new court petition last week.

"I can't tell you how aggravating it is," Anat Hoffman, executive director of the Reform movement's Israel Religious Action Center, told JTA. "We thought this was a victory, and then it started to be a rigmarole. It's a real insult."

Last year's Supreme Court ruling determined that Reform, Conservative and other non-Orthodox rabbis in rural communities could be recognized as "rabbis of non-Orthodox communities" and receive wages equal to those granted by the state to Orthodox rabbis.

Rabbi Miri Gold

Several caveats, however, set special conditions for non-Orthodox clergy. The decision applied only to Israel's regional councils – large districts of rural communities – but not Israeli cities. The rabbis would be paid by the Ministry of Culture and Sport rather than the Religious Affairs Ministry, which pays Orthodox rabbis. The non-Orthodox rabbis would not have religious legal authority over such matters as marriage, divorce and conversion.

Two months ago, the Ministry of Culture and Sport released its new criteria for non-Orthodox rabbis to collect state salaries. To be eligible, the rabbis must work full time and be present at their congregation for at least 40 Sabbaths per year. Only rabbis of congregations with at least 250 members can receive full-time pay. Those leading congregations of 50 to 250 members may receive half a salary even though they'd be required to work full time.

By contrast, Orthodox rabbis do not need to work a certain number of hours, and there is no minimum size requirement for their congregations to qualify for salaries.

Aside from the obvious inequalities, the new rules put Rabbi Gold in something of a catch-22 in 2012: Unable to raise a full-time salary on her own last year, she worked only half time. As a result, she won't be paid at all for her work in 2012.

"Part of the reason our rabbis are part time is that there isn't enough funding," Rabbi Gold told JTA. "The idea is to have more of an even playing field. The more we can be available to people, the richer Jewish life will be in this country."

A spokeswoman for the Ministry of Culture and Sport, Or Doron, said non-Orthodox rabbis are paid according to "set criteria" and that the ministry uses the same pay scale as those for Orthodox rabbis. Just two non-Orthodox rabbis currently meet the criteria for state wages: rabbis Yoav Ende of Kibbutz Hannaton and Shai Zarchi of Nigun Halev, a congregation in the town of Nahalal, near Haifa.

Doron said that in light of complaints submitted by the Reform and Conservative movements, the ministry is considering changing its criteria for 2013 to allow for part-time salaries. Reform and Conservative advocates say the change is coming too slowly; last week's court petition is an attempt to push things along.

"It's hard to move these things without the courts," said Orly Erez-Likhovski, the lawyer who submitted the petition. Aside from Rabbi Gold, the other rabbi named in the petition is Rabbi Benjie Gruber, a Conservative rabbi from Kibbutz Yahel in southern Israel.

Rabbi Gold says she sees one potential glimmer of hope: the makeup of the new Knesset.

The Yesh Atid party, which controls 19 seats, includes advocates for religious pluralism such as the liberal Jewish scholar Ruth Calderon. In her inaugural Knesset speech, Calderon called for equal state support for secular and pluralistic institutions on par with Orthodox ones. Rabbi Gold hopes that means a wider push for the rights of non-Orthodox rabbis.

"Meaningful change can happen in the Knesset," Rabbi Gold said. "It would be healthier if some of these decisions were coming out of the government and we wouldn't have to run to the court."

Senior rabbi accused of sexual abuse

Miriam Shaviv
The Times of Israel

LONDON — A man believed to be Chaim Halpern, a London rabbi, was arrested Feb. 20 in connection with investigations into sexual assault and perverting the course of justice.

The London Metropolitan Police will not name him, but the man appears to be Rabbi Halpern, a former religious judge for the Union of Orthodox Hebrew Congregations, who has been at the centre of a sexual abuse scandal that has roiled London's haredi community since October.

Three more men were also arrested Feb. 20 on suspicion of perverting the course of justice in the case. They are all in custody at a north London police station and may be held for up to 48 hours without charge.

One is believed to be a brother of Rabbi Halpern.

According to the London Metropolitan Police, all the arrests were made at addresses in the borough of Barnet, which includes the Orthodox suburb of Golders Green, where Rabbi Halpern is a resident. The main suspect is 54; the others are 64, 62 and 25.

Last month, a religious court convened by the UOHC began deliberating on the case of Rabbi Halpern, who has been accused of inappropriate sexual conduct with approximately 30 women who came to him for counselling and religious guidance. The judges were due to reconvene in early March.

Rabbi Halpern is a member of one of London's most prominent haredi families, and attempts to force him out of his public positions have deeply divided the community. Although he resigned as a religious judge and rabbinic adviser to several London institutions in November, he continued to serve as rabbi of his own synagogue. In December, five senior London rabbis issued a public statement declaring him "not fit and proper to act in any rabbinic capacity."

After months of public silence, Rabbi Halpern recently went on the offensive, earlier this month securing a high court order for Google to identify the IP address of the owner of Ifyoutickleus, a blog that has covered the case closely, as well as the IP addresses of more than 20 commentators on the site. His lawyers claimed the comments were defamatory.

The London Metropolitan Police's Barnet Borough Commander, Adrian Usher, said: "In Barnet, we are currently working with members of all our communities to ensure the voices of victims of abuse are heard. My message to those victims is simple: Come forward and we will listen to, support and believe you."

Sharansky to head JAFI again

Members of the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) board of governors have re-elected Natan Sharansky for another term as JAFI's chairman of the executive, Israel Hayom reported. The board meets three times a year, with participants from Jewish communities and organizations from Israel and around the world. Sharansky, perhaps the best-known Soviet "refusenik," spent nine years in the Soviet Gulag. He established the Yisrael B'Aliyah party in Israel and served as deputy prime minister, and since 2009 has overseen JAFI's shift in attention from aliyah to building global Jewish identity.

JAFI seeks Pollard's release

The Jewish Agency passed a resolution urging U.S. President Barack Obama to grant clemency to spy-for-Israel Jonathan Pollard. The agency's board of governors passed the resolution unanimously on Feb. 19 during its annual meeting in Jerusalem. It calls for Pollard's release on humanitarian grounds, noting that he's completing his 28th year of a life sentence in a U.S. federal prison and claiming the sentence is "overly harsh." The resolution also refers to Pollard's "various illnesses and deteriorating health." The resolution was passed one month before Obama is scheduled to make his first visit to Israel as president.

Conversion recognition sought

An Israeli advocacy group filed a lawsuit seeking the recognition of all Orthodox conversions performed in Israel. The Jewish Advocacy Center for ITIM: the Jewish Life Information Center petitioned the Supreme Court calling on the Interior Ministry to recognize the conversions, specifically those performed in private Orthodox rabbinical courts. The petition urges the government to create a conversion process that is fair and accessible. The petition was filed on behalf of converts to Judaism who completed the conversion process headed by two Orthodox rabbis, Nissim Karelitz and Adin Even-Israel Steinsaltz. Though the conversions were certified by the rabbinical court, the Interior Ministry didn't recognize them.

Obama to get medal

U.S. President Barack Obama will receive the Presidential Medal of Distinction from Israeli President Shimon Peres. The award will be presented to Obama at a state dinner hosted by Peres in Jerusalem during Obama's visit next month to Israel. It's the first time that a serving U.S. president will receive an award of this kind from the president of Israel, according to Peres' office. "Barack Obama is a true friend of the State of Israel, and has been since the beginning of his public life," read the recommendation of the advisory committee for the Presidential Medal of Distinction that was released by Peres' office Feb. 18.

Brock business school named for investor

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Brock University officially launched its business school earlier this month under a new name: the Goodman School of Business.

The moniker honours Ned Goodman, a businessman, geologist and investment expert who has served as university chancellor for the past five years. This is the first time that the university has renamed a faculty for a donor.

The change comes after the Goodman Foundation gave the school a "transformational gift," which will go toward a new building for the business school, as well as student scholarships, research and programming for community development, said Don Cyr, dean of the Goodman School of Business.

Cyr said Goodman's donation came with the condition that the school would not disclose the amount.

The two-hour ceremony to officially open the renamed school took place Feb. 6, and was attended by more than 200 students, alumni, professors, university officials and members of the community.

Cyr said it was a positive formal start to the new school, which was met by a great sense of spirit and confidence.

Goodman is the CEO and founder of investment management firms Dundee Corporation and Dundee Wealth, though his career spans more than 40 years in the industry. Among his many philanthropic activities, Goodman is a former vice-president of the national executive committee for the Jewish sports organization Maccabi Canada.

Cyr said that since the announcement of the new name, the business program has seen a 22 per cent increase in applications compared to the same time last year.

"I think of it akin to the market seeing his contribution to the school as the move of a wise investor," he said.

The announcement first came in October, the same week Laurentian University announced that it, too, would honour the Goodman family by renaming its mining faculty after the Goodman Foundation gave the school a significant gift.

"We want to be associated with Laurentian University because it's undoubtedly the go-to university for mineral exploration and mining in Canada," Goodman said in a statement at the time.

Goodman was also inducted into the Canadian Mining Hall of Fame last year for his contributions to the industry, including helping to build several mining companies and investing in others.

In order for a new business school building to be constructed at Brock, the school must first apply to the provincial Ministry of Training, Colleges and Universities for additional support, Cyr said, adding that the university has a very strong case.

"We have been one of the fastest-growing business schools in Canada in the past 10 years," he said, adding that it's now in the top 10 in terms of size in the country, with 2,800 undergraduate students, 400 graduate students, and 90 faculty members.

With Goodman's name attached the school, Cyr said the university should see a very positive impact.

"He's an extremely strong businessman with an entrepreneurial spirit and that's certainly representative of the nature of our degree programs," Cyr said.

"We're very proud to be the recipient of the support and obviously the confidence in us."

Samsung promotion combines marketing, Purim baskets

David Shamah
The Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — Israel is a small market for a company like Samsung, but the Jewish state has a special place in the heart of the Korean electronics giant.

Israel is the home of two important Samsung R&D facilities, where engineers developed, among other things, key components of the Galaxy S3 smart camera and cellphone.

In the past, Samsung has set up an Internet television system for Israelis and sponsored the Israeli Olympic team. This year, Samsung helped disadvantaged Israeli kids celebrate Purim.

In a combination marketing campaign and charity project, Samsung sent 10,000 Purim baskets to anyone in Israel lucky enough to have a friend that signs them up for one on the Samsung Mobile Israel Facebook page. Each basket is full of Purim goodies (candies and the like), and was to be delivered by the end of Shushan Purim to any address in Israel. Samsung is paying for the candy, and is paying two Israeli organizations, Variety Israel and the Enosh Fund, to assemble them.

The baskets are sent out via a Facebook app on the Samsung Mobile Israel page. The app requires loading up a virtual phone with all of the virtues of the Galaxy S3 Mini smartphone (1.0 ghz processor, voice recognition, the latest Android operating system, etc.) Once the phone's loaded up, you're presented with a form where you can add a greeting, and attach the recipient's address. And there's an extra bonus: If your greeting is good enough, you can win one of five Galaxy S3 Mini smartphones Samsung is giving away as part of the promotion.

Variety Israel provides medical treatment, equipment, and other assistance to tens of thousands of disabled kids, while Enosh works on behalf of families that have members with mental disabilities. The Facebook app has been active for the past few days, but there have been a few glitches – with the site not responding, or the greeting not being recorded by the server.

In response, Samsung Israel said that the glitches were due to overloading of the server by users, who mobbed the app when it first went up, and that the company was heartened to see how many people were sending Purim gifts to friends and loved ones, and how Variety Israel and Enosh would benefit.

The war in letters, libraries and hidden notebooks

Reviewed by

Norman Ravvin

Vilnius, the contemporary capital of Lithuania, is far north of Warsaw and inland from the Baltic Sea. Known among Jews as Vilna before the Second World War, the life and death of its wartime ghetto is a story less well known than that of the Polish ghettos in Warsaw and Lodz. Julija Šukys' Epistolophilia: Writing the Life of Ona Šimaitė, provides an unusual avenue to recovering Vilna's particular fate under German occupation.

Ona Šimaitė, likely unknown to most readers, was living not far from Vilna's ghetto in the fall of 1941. Until her arrest by the Gestapo in April, 1944, she undertook complicated clandestine activities, including the smuggling of necessities into the ghetto, sneaking those incarcerated inside into hiding in the occupied city, as well as substantial efforts to hide documentation of the ghetto outside its environs, in the hope that this material would survive the war if its authors did not. In this, she shared goals with the secret ghetto archivists of Lodz and Warsaw, who buried their work inside milk containers and tin boxes.

Šimaitė's arrest led first to torture, then to a short term at Dachau, and transport to a work camp in German-occupied France. The population of the Vilna Ghetto was decimated by a series of transports of thousands of Jews to the forested suburbs of Vilna known as Ponary, where they were murdered in pits.

Clandestine activity took many forms during the existence of the Vilna Ghetto. It included efforts by the poet Avrom Sutzkever to preserve the archive and library belonging to YIVO, the Vilna-based institute for the study of Yiddish language and contemporary Jewish culture. And under the poet Abba Kovner the ghetto harboured a resistance movement that later joined with Soviet-led partisans in the surrounding forests.

Šukys' portrait of Ona Šimaitė depicts a patchwork of periods and locales, which include postwar life in France and Israel, her letter writing to Lithuanians she would never see again, and her mission, based upon wartime promises, to inform "friends and family of Vilna dead" about the ghetto experience of their loved ones. Epistolophilia, the unusual word that characterizes this latter commitment, refers to Šimaitė's seeming compulsion to write letters, at all costs, sometimes as many as fourteen a day. One must, she informed a niece by post, "write a letter as if saying a prayer: concentrated, and with bells ringing."

The most remarkable of Šimaitė's recollections of the Vilna Ghetto appear in letters she wrote immediately after the war to Hirsz Abramowicz, who was traveling in America at the war's outbreak, leaving him safely stranded while his wife and daughter were trapped in the ghetto. Having attained permission to enter the ghetto under the made-up project of recovering unreturned university library books, Šimaitė encountered Dina and Anna Abramowicz "in a single tiny room together with the entire Schreiber family and with the Zhazdik girls, who were much loved by the family (in all, 9 people). The furniture consisted of 1 bed, 1 table, 2 chairs. During the day all the bedding and belongings were piled into one corner." Šimaitė informs Abramowicz that his wife "dedicated every free moment to reading." Her "favorite book in the ghetto was a volume of Bialik's poetry. She also read a great deal about black Americans . . . ."

> 'During the Ponary massacres, when the killings were at their height, there was a notable upsurge in borrowings from the ghetto's lending libraries'

Such reports on what her acquaintances in the ghetto read reflect Šimaitė's reverence for books, for the libraries that protected them and the librarians who dedicated themselves to such work.

Šukys tells us that during the Ponary massacres, when the killings were at their height, there was a notable upsurge in borrowings from the ghetto's lending libraries. Demand was high for "semi-trashy" books; while from serious literature, those in the shadow of the mass killings chose to read War and Peace, Eric Maria Remarque's All Quiet on the Western Front, Emile Zola's War and Franz Werfel's The Forty Days of Musa Dagh, about the Armenian genocide. This latter choice reflects readers' deep appreciation of the historical events that were unfolding around them.

Šimaitė devoted herself to the ghetto's record keepers. Among these was Herman Kruk, who was ordered by the Nazis to choose rare books from Jewish libraries, which would be sent back to collections in Germany. He and Šimaitė chose texts to hide from the Germans, while he filled 39 notebooks with depictions of life in the ghetto. Secreting these out of the ghetto, Šimaitė stashed them "in a metal box under two floorboards in the university library's attic." Kruk was murdered, but after the war, with Šimaitė's directions, the notebooks were found.

Epistolophilia is informed by Šukys' interest in Šimaitė's troubled family life, her seeming celibacy, her inability or unwillingness to compose a memoir of the war years, her troubled postwar life in France, and, her short stay in the 1950s in Israel. Throughout the postwar years she refused awards and honours for her activities in Vilna. Notably though, in 1966, Yad Vashem designated her among its Righteous Among the Gentiles.

Norman Ravvin's recent books include the novel, The Joyful Child (Gaspereau) and Failure's Opposite: Listening to A.M. Klein, co-edited with Sherry Simon (McGill-Queen's).

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

PHOTOGRAPHS FROM THE LODZ GHETTO ON EXHIBIT AT YORK U

The Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies and the Osgoode Hall Law School at York University are co-hosts of a major new exhibition, The Face of the Ghetto: Pictures by Jewish Photographers from the Lodz Ghetto, 1940 to 1944.

The exhibition features some 50 large-scale photographs taken by photographers in the Lodz (or Litzmannstadt) Ghetto between 1940 and 1944. While the Jews in the ghetto were prohibited from possessing cameras, a few were given cameras and commissioned to document the efficiency of the ghetto factories and other sites of slave labour. At their own initiative and risk, they also took thousands of photographs of Jewish life in the ghetto.

Unlike photographs taken by Nazis, the photographs in this exhibition were taken by photographers who shared the fate of the people they photographed. The photos reflect a deep empathy with the ghetto inhabitants and reflect their struggle to maintain their dignity and culture in the face of their unspeakably harsh and increasingly helpless situation.

Assembled by the Topography of Terror Foundation in Berlin, the exhibition draws upon nearly 12,000 contact prints held in the Lodz State Archive and includes excerpts from the Chronicle of the Lodz Ghetto and statements by former ghetto residents. It was shown at the United Nations in New York in 2012. In conjunction with the exhibition, York has scheduled a series of lectures, films and panels on issues related to Lodz, the Holocaust, and the use of photography and art as a vehicle for testimony and resistance.

Klezmer jazz duo takes its 'maiden voyage' in T.O.

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Joel Rubin has performed his music all over the world over several decades, but March 2 will mark his first-ever Toronto gig – and his first concert in Canada since the 1980s.

The show also marks another first: it will be the first joint performance between the klezmer musician and jazz artist Uri Caine since the release of their album Azoy Tsu Tsveyt in 2011.

The album bridges each artist's sounds, creating a musical blend that Rubin hopes will resonate with the audience when they perform at St. George the Martyr Church in Toronto at a concert presented by the Music Gallery and the Ashkenaz Festival.

"This [will be] our maiden voyage in a live context," Rubin said. "Toronto gets the scoop."

Caine, a pianist from Philadelphia, has 22 albums to his name. On this album, he joined Rubin, on clarinet, playing klezmer tunes in a non-traditional manner. Rubin, wrote two original songs for the album and chose the rest of the repertoire, which consists of arrangements of traditional tunes, as well as songs based on his friends' music.

Rubin, who is originally from Los Angeles, grew up listening to Yiddish music, but said he was never interested in it as a child.

"I found out long after my grandfather died that he probably came from some kind of a klezmer background," he said, explaining that he was probably a wedding musician in Ukraine – though not necessarily a very good one, he joked.

Rubin studied classical clarinet and spent a year playing freelance in New York City. He followed that with a move to Boston, where he was introduced to klezmer musicians, which inspired him to form his own klezmer band.

Once he got started, he never looked back, he said.

Initially, it was the virtuosity of the clarinet players that drew him to the music style.

"It had a whole kind of world of expression that was familiar yet not that familiar," he said. "Once I started playing it, I found I could do it well pretty rapidly, and it just seemed a pretty natural way of expressing on the clarinet."

Learning to play klezmer was a bit like learning a new language – just like learning jazz, blues or any other style, he said. "I just had to learn the vocabulary."

The trick was figuring out how to learn to play it like the skilled older players he had seen perform. Once he matched their sound, it became a question of finding his own voice. That became something of a crisis for him in the late 1980s, he said, adding that it took it until the late '90s that he felt he found it.

During that time, he left the United States and moved to Berlin, where he stayed for 14 years. The decision to move was a mix of discovering there was more interest for his music in Europe than in North America and getting fed up with American politics.

While in Europe, he wrote his PhD in musicology, and then in 2003, he moved back to the States to teach. These days, he runs the music performance program and teaches musicology at the University of Virginia.

Teaching klezmer means he had to approach the style from an academic eye, rather than acquiring the techniques "like a baby," copying what he heard from other people.

However, he doesn't think teaching has changed the way he writes music, since he approaches writing, teaching and playing from different standpoints. For example, when he's performing, he still considers the structure of the music, but he focuses on being in the moment with the music and his fellow performers.

"Playing live music, when it's really good, you lose your sense of self and join a larger unit – even if it's a duo," he said. "That doesn't happen very often."

He hopes it'll happen when he plays with Caine in Toronto, and they plan to use the performance to figure out where to take this duo in the future.

"We can sit back and decide if we should pursue it and make another album," Rubin said.

Film featuring Shin Bet directors doesn't mince words

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

In Dror Moreh's penetrating and important Israeli film, The Gatekeepers, which opens in Toronto and Montreal on March 1, six former directors of the Shin Bet, Israel's domestic secret service, candidly discuss their jobs, the war on terrorism and Israel's occupation of the West Bank.

The directors in question in Moreh's 97-minute film, which was a contender for an Academy Award in the documentary category, are Avraham Shalom, Yaakov Peri, Carmi Gillon, Ami Ayalon, Avi Dichter and Yuval Diskin. They respectively served from 1980 until 2011.

Shalom, the oldest of the lot, was forced to resign after an Israeli newspaper exposed his role in the summary execution of two Palestinian terrorists who had been captured alive after hijacking a bus.

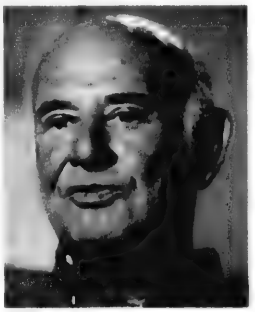
Peri is credited with setting up a network of Palestinian informers in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip upon which Israel relies to nip terrorism in the bud. Gillon, who focused on Jewish terrorism, stepped down after his boss, Yitzhak Rabin, was assassinated by a Jewish zealot.

Ami Ayalon tried to rehabilitate the Shin Bet in the wake of Rabin's death and attempted to stamp out the first embers of the second Palestinian uprising. Dichter, left to deal with the violent repercussions of the intifadah, initiated Israel's policy of targeted assassinations of Palestinian terrorist leaders. Diskin carried on his work.

Although they performed their duties with a high degree of ruthlessness, they are not hawks, as one might assume, and support a two-state solution. As Peri suggests, "you become a bit of a leftist" after you've waded into the depths of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

The Gatekeepers, however, is hardly a polemical work. Its content and mood are solely determined by the interviewees, who have access to information normally way off the grid.

The Shin Bet is portrayed as a well-oiled organization that has been astonishingly successful in keeping terrorism at bay. Shalom alludes to this, but adds that the Palestinian problem was left to fester and that the prime minister he worked for, Menachem Begin, did not take it into proper consideration.



Yaakov Peri

Gillon discusses interrogation techniques, mentioning in passing sleep deprivation and shaking, and says that tough measures were used to prevent suicide bombings. He observes that ideologically motivated Hamas terrorists are harder to break than secular Palestinian nationalists.

In discussing the war on terrorism, one notorious incident of which ignominiously ended his career, Shalom maintains that morality does not enter into the equation. Disagreeing with Shalom's harsh assessment, Diskin says that the Shin Bet cannot act outside the norms of the legal system.

Peri, who was recently elected to the Knesset as a Yesh Atid party representative, claims that the first Palestinian uprising was a spontaneous eruption and that the Shin Bet did not foresee it. He adds that Israel should have reached an accord with the Palestinians and withdrawn from the territories.

In related comments, Peri argues that Israeli governments have "coddled" Jewish settlers and "looked away" as they built a web of settlements in the West Bank and Gaza.

Gillon contends that Jewish extremists could have touched off a war with the Muslim world had they blown up the Dome of the Rock in eastern Jerusalem. He is bitter that members of a Jewish underground group were released from prison so soon after their arrest.

Gillon advised Rabin to wear body armour and increase his security detail, but the prime minister refused, a mistake that cost him his life. In his view, Yigal Amir, the assassin, changed the course of Israel's history "big time."

In a claim that has surely raised the hackles of politicians across the board, Peri says that a succession of Israeli governments had no "real desire" to reach an accommodation with the Palestinians following Rabin's murder.

Ayalon dispassionately describes Hamas' suicide bombing campaign, from the mid-1990s onward, as an attempt to equalize the balance of power with Israel. Dichter fills in some of the blanks concerning Israel's response.

For his part, Shalom decries a retaliatory policy dependent on what he calls "overkill." In a similar vein, Ayalon warns that targeted assassinations may lead to a greater upsurge of terrorism and further radicalize the Palestinians leadership.

Dichter reveals that Israel had an opportunity in 2003 to kill Hamas' entire leadership, but cancelled the operation out of fear that innocent bystanders would be killed.

Without exception, the former directors call for negotiations with the Palestinians, the sooner the better, warning that the status quo is unsustainable. "We've made life miserable for the Palestinians," says Gillon. Shalom, in a reference to Israel's "brutal occupation," claims that the future is "bleak and dark."

Clearly, whether or not you agree with their assessments, The Gatekeepers does not mince words.

Behind-the-scenes history of New York landmark

Compiled by CJN Staff

The story behind the construction of New York's Seagram Building, considered an architectural masterpiece, will be published this spring by Phyllis Lambert, who was its young director of planning.

Lambert, daughter of Seagram's distilling magnate Samuel Bronfman, has written Building Seagram, which will be released by Yale University Press in April.

Lambert was a 27-year-old artist living in Paris in the 1950s when her father asked her to take over the search for an architect to design his company's headquarters in New York.

Lambert, today founder and chair of the board of trustees of Montreal's Canadian Centre for Architecture, aimed high, choosing one of the pioneering masters of modern architecture, German-born Ludwig Mies van der Rohe.

Lambert worked closely with him and his collaborator, the influential American architect Philip Johnson.

The Seagram Building

The elegant 38-storey bronze and glass building, set back from Park Avenue, was completed in 1958, and remains an icon of 20th-century architecture.

Lambert, who later became an architect herself, established herself as a leading architectural patron, credited with changing the face of the American skyline.

"Building Seagram represents what has always been the focus of my practice: architecture as a major socio-economic manifestation in society," Lambert said.

The book is the culmination of more than a decade of research. Lambert makes use of previously unpublished personal archives, company correspondence and photographs to give an insider's view of the debates, resolutions and behind-the-scenes dramas surrounding the project.

She has set this history within the context of the culture of post-World War II design, including the significant part corporate patronage played in the era's real estate development.

Lambert offers a scholarly assessment of the design and construction process, and the building's cultural legacy. The project played a substantial role in shaping landmark zoning laws and other legislation in New York.

She also provides a personal account of her experience managing the project, as well as insight into the working relationship between Mies and Johnson, including the latter's underrecognized contributions.

The 320-page book is illustrated with almost 200 pictures. The foreword is by Barry Bergdoll, a professor of architectural history at Columbia University and the Philip Johnson Chief Curator of Architecture and Design at the Museum of Modern Art.

Players take different routes to NCAA Division 1 teams

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Two young hockey players are taking substantially different paths to Division 1 hockey careers in NCAA schools

Daniel Leavens will be the first to lace up his skates for a top NCAA school; next season the 18-year-old forward will make the jump from the Newmarket Hurricanes of the Ontario Junior Hockey League (OJHL) to Robert Morris University (RMU) in Pittsburgh.

Jesse Schwartz is taking a different route; he'll play with the University of Connecticut, but that won't happen until the 2014 season. And instead of making the jump to the NCAA from junior, as many talented Canadians do, right now he's studying and playing hockey at the South Kent Prep School in Connecticut. And after that, he'd like to get another year of seasoning under his belt in the USHL or the BC Hockey League before he makes the move to Division 1.

Schwartz, 18, is already living away from home, residing in a dorm, hanging out with the guys, getting used to life on his own. For someone who's only been away at overnight camp, it's an adjustment.

"Here it's different. I'm away from my family and friends. You have to adapt to it quick, because you're here for the whole year."

Jesse Schwartz

Daniel Leavens

"I worked my butt off to get the scholarship" to UConn, Schwartz added.

Schwartz had some options before choosing the prep school/NCAA route. He was drafted by the Erie Otters of the Ontario Hockey League, but "if I'd step foot in an OHL game, I'd have lost my NCAA eligibility," he said.

But patience is a virtue and he chose to join UConn, which will be moving to Hockey East, considered the best division in U.S. college hockey, from the Atlantic Hockey Conference.

In the meantime, Schwartz is working on his game; like other guys of junior age (16-19), he's focusing on his "explosiveness," the first three steps a player takes from a stop. Getting to maximum speed as quickly as possible is pretty much the holy grail when skating skills are considered.

As to the rest of his game, Schwartz describes himself as "an all-round player; a two-way forward. I focus on the defensive end as much as the offensive end," he said.

In around 50 games with South Kent – the calibre of hockey is comparable to major midget back home – he's racked up 21 goals and added 52 assists. He's around 50 per cent in the faceoff circle and he's been told by UConn coaches he has "good vision" and is "good positionally."

Schwartz, who attended CHAT for a couple of years after spending six years at USDS Bathurst, was selected to the Canadian Maccabiah hockey team as an alternate. Hockey will return to the Games, which are scheduled for July.

For Schwartz, it will be his second time playing at the Canada Centre in Metulla. He competed in the World Jewish Cup there a few years ago.

Leavens, meanwhile, is playing in Ontario, leading the Hurricanes in points; after 51 games, he's scored 23 goals and added 43 assists for 66 points.

The combination of Leavens, Brandon Francisco and Chris Chiste is Newmarket's top line. "We're very offensive," said Leavens. "All three are good at putting the puck in the net, making good plays…We like to skate with the puck and keep possession of it."

Leavens, 19, enjoys his role as playmaker. "I take pride in making the good pass, setting up a nice goal," he said.

"At six-foot-two, Daniel will add size to our forwards as well as a much coveted right hand shot, which we are in short supply of," said RMU Colonials assistant coach Matt Nicholson.

"Daniel was a member of Team Canada East at the 2011 World Junior 'A' Challenge and this speaks to his ability to play at a high level with other elite players. Arguably the best quality that Daniel possesses is his versatility. Positionally, he can play on the wing or up the middle at the centre position, he skates well, has soft hands to make plays and a quick release that adds to his hard, accurate shot."

Team Canada East won the silver medal at the Challenge; Leavens was also a member of Team OJHL North at the Central Canada Cup All-Star Challenge, again winning silver. However, as a member of Mississauga Rattlers, he won a gold medal at the Ontario Junior A Inline League, two years in a row, and as a member of the Israeli Stars of David, a collection of Jewish players competing in the Canadian Multicultural Hockey Championships, he won the title twice.

Drew Brees to headline dinner

Compiled by CJN Staff

WINNIPEG — New Orleans Saints' pro-bowl quarterback Drew Brees is coming to Winnipeg – as the keynote speaker for the 41st "Y" Sports Dinner on June 13.

Brees led the New Orleans Saints to the 2009 Super Bowl championship, being named MVP in the game. A former Heisman trophy finalist while playing for the Purdue Boilermakers, he has also been named to seven Pro Bowls.

"We are excited to have Drew Brees as our keynote speaker," Blair Worb, the "Y" Sports Dinner chairman, said in a news release. "Not only is he an exciting football player, but as much pride he takes in his on-field performance, he takes even more pride in his community service and philanthropic efforts. That is why he is such a perfect fit as keynote speaker at the "Y" Sports Dinner this year."

Quality of life issue

For Jewish practitioners in palliative care, the obligation means returning patients to a life that was not full of suffering.

Indeed, Gordon said the relief of suffering using pain management is the hallmark of this area of medicine.

"Palliative care is not part of the acute health-care system. It is away from the hub of active treatment."

A more recent change in the philosophy behind palliative care, Gordon said, is that it's now more widely believed that it should be started before the terminal phase of a disease has set in, so people can begin thinking about what they want to do when the end approaches.

"They need to [begin thinking] about the balance between medical intervention and comfort."

Dr. Harvey Chochinov

Most people think of cancer when they think of palliative care, but "the next big step is to consider non-malignant conditions [such as dementia] within the realm of palliative care," he said.

"Chronic disease management offers comfort and care, so patients don't die in an acute situation. When we can see the end of a trajectory, we can probably [help] avoid suffering."

Dr. Harvey Chochinov, director of the Manitoba palliative care research unit at CancerCare Manitoba, said that he became involved in palliative care because he has always been interested in helping people through difficult times.

"Appreciating vulnerability as part of being human is key to understanding the needs of people facing the uncertainties of illness and declining health. This is especially true near the end of life," Chochinov said.

"Doing research in palliative care gives me an opportunity to study these issues. The more we understand the connections between the physical, psychological and spiritual dimensions of approaching death, the better we are able to care for patients and their families."

He said he's been asked innumerable times if his work is depressing. His response is that "not being able to right a wrong is depressing… hopelessness and futility is depressing. Palliative care is none of those things. It is about trying to improve the quality of life for patients and their families for whatever time they have remaining.

"There is a vast difference between dying well and dying poorly. Good care can decrease pain and suffering, and [can] change the memories that will be carried by bereaved families for the rest of their lives. No doubt, the experience of working with extremely ill patients and their families can be challenging, but people working in palliative care do so because they like to make a difference at a time when that difference can be profound."

The philosophy of palliative care upholds certain core Jewish values, he said, "like menschlichkeit and respect for the rights, feelings, wishes and abilities of others. Perhaps that's why studying dignity at the end of life has had such deep, personal resonance."

Chochinov noted that Immanuel Kant, the 18th-century German philosopher, argued that everything either has a price or a dignity.

"Anything that has a price is replaceable by something of equivalent value. On the other hand, whatever is above a price and [has] no equivalent has a dignity. The message for health-care providers is that every patient is unique and irreplaceable."

This idea is consistent with Jewish values, he said, but it's "by no means exclusively Jewish. Death and dying are issues that transcend religion and race, socioeconomic status and sexual orientation. These issues touch everyone – patients and health-care providers alike. The realization that very little separates us from our patients, I think, underpins the ability to provide empathetic care."

He said that many people think being admitted to palliative care is a death sentence, "but without trying to sound morose, being human carries a final prognosis. That said, if life must end, why not strive to live the best quality of life possible until life runs out? People are often admitted to our program and discharged home once their symptoms are under better control."

Chochinov said that most medical schools across Canada offer students some minimal exposure to palliative care, and both the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Canada and the College of Family Physicians of Canada have established an accredited training program.

"However, there is still a long way to go. People should expect more, which means that health-care providers, including doctors, need to learn more about how to deliver quality, comfort-enhancing palliative care."

Families have to start thinking about discussing end-of-life care with their loved ones, he said.

"Discussions about end of life can be reframed and broadened into conversations about relationships and how we feel about the people who matter to us. 'I care about you in sickness and in health, and in good times and bad times. What you want matters to me, today, tomorrow, and even when the time comes that you might not be able to speak for yourself, so let's talk now.' That strikes me as a gentle way to get started."

Young filmmaker has an old soul

Jordan Adler
Special to The CJN

When Michelle Kahn was five years old, she had a crush on Elvis. She can also remember watching The Beatles on The Ed Sullivan Show and falling in love with them. She thinks about growing old, but says she doesn't want to retire from directing films, her passion since high school.

Kahn is only 23.

The Toronto-born filmmaker has old-fashioned sensibilities but keeps herself compulsively busy, jumping from gig to gig. When she is not making short films, Kahn teaches drama and produces and directs plays for Jewish day schools and community centres around Toronto. She says she could not see her life moving at any other speed.

"I'll get on a project like a play. I'll have just started producing it, and then my dad will turn around and say, 'I think you can also do this. Why don't you try that?'" she says. "So I'll have five or six things going at once, and I'll just do them. I'm like an Energizer bunny."

Kahn was not drawn to filmmaking by venturing out to the local cinema, which she seldom does, but by planning her life around the schedule of the cable channel, Turner Classic Movies. TCM first exposed her to silent films, which she quickly fell in love with – especially the films of Charlie Chaplin.

"I thought [silent film] was the coolest thing in the world," Kahn says. "I couldn't understand how they filmed it. I didn't understand how you got the words on the screen. So, I researched all about it."

She shuffled biography after biography of pioneering early Hollywood figures to her classes at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Kimel campus. Many of the books focused on how the entertainers she revered never went to high school but started working on their passion in their teens.

"I was afraid I was going to be late in the game if I waited until after CHAT," she says.

Kahn wrote her first short film – a silent, Chaplin-inspired slapstick comedy called Sunset and Camden – in an hour, during a French class. She spent the next two years preparing the 10-minute film about two men vying for a young woman's affection at a bus stop.

Sunset and Camden was a family affair: Kahn played the female protagonist, her father, Trevor, held the camera, sister Orly did the makeup, brother Joseph starred as a paperboy, and mother Gracy provided the craft services – including pies that were thrown at the actors' faces.

When she entered the film in the Tanenbaum CHAT film festival, Kahn says she was the underdog. "Everyone told me I was going to lose because it was a silent movie and it was in black-and-white and it was a period piece. Nobody votes for that."

However, the presence of many parents and grandparents in the audience shifted support in Kahn's favour. She won with 70 per cent of the vote.

Inspired, she began submitting Sunset and Camden to different film festivals across North America. That film and a sophomore short, In the Army, were screened at Sprockets, a family-oriented film festival in Toronto. Kahn's shorts have also been screened at festivals in Idaho, Nova Scotia and California.

She says her early short films were silent because she didn't want to tackle sound mixing. Kahn produced her first "talkie" at her father's behest when she attended York University for film studies.

"[My family] wants me to be in movies. That's weird for a Jewish family," she says, noting that her parents would encourage her to skip class to follow up with festival organizers. "My parents were the ones who always said, 'Send them an email, send them a phone call… It's a business call. It's more important.'"

When she is not shouting orders behind the camera, Kahn is doing the same thing behind the curtain. She directs and produces musicals at several Jewish day schools, including the Associated Hebrew Schools' Danilack Middle School, where she is currently working on a version of Mamma Mia, cheekily titled Ima Oy! As the head of Oy-Oy Productions, she is also working on a production of A Chorus Line featuring adult performers. Both shows will be staged in March.

She also teaches drama at J Roots Supplementary Jewish School, which she says is her way to give back to the Jewish community by helping kids express themselves through acting, especially kids who are being bullied or who have low self-esteem. Even though she doesn't want to work as a teacher full time, Kahn hopes that putting on plays can help lift the children's spirits.

"I want to inspire them because when I was little, I was bullied really badly," she says. "I was the class loser." She says that other kids picked on her for being quiet and different, with her interest in classic movies and television, more attuned to The Beatles than The Backstreet Boys.

To distract herself from her peers' scorn, Kahn resorted to watching movies. "I'd like to think that if I wasn't bullied as bad as I was, I wouldn't be in movies right now," she says.

Kahn has plans to shoot another silent short film this spring and hopes to write a feature-length film. Later this year, she says she plans to shop around to festivals in North America a feature documentary she made about her grandfather, Wanted: The Joseph Esses Story. It chronicles her grandfather's difficult life growing up in Aleppo, Syria, where the Jewish community was often the target of harsh criticism and violence.

When Kahn screened the film in Toronto in January, she was thrilled to see her grandfather's glowing reaction. She says that watching his face was one of the proudest moments of her young career. That response, however, did not compare to her watching Sunset and Camden with an audience at Sprockets in Toronto, an experience that she says changed her life.

"There was this three-second or less shot of my face as I wait for a bus. I saw my face on the big screen and said, 'I want to make movies.'"

Trouble coping after loss

Dear Ella,

I've had a rough couple of weeks. I came home after work and when I opened the front door, Coco saw another dog across the street, ran out past me and was hit by a car. I rushed her to the emergency clinic, where they took her immediately, but I had to sign in advance for payment. I was so distraught at the time, I would have signed anything. Coco didn't survive, and all I was left with was her collar and a huge bill. On top of losing my best friend, my baby, I now have additional debt.

I miss Coco with all my heart, and I'm finding it hard to breathe, let alone function at work. I take frequent breaks and cry in the bathroom stall. I haven't told anyone what happened, because I know I will burst into tears.

One of my co-workers started to criticize the way I was doing something, and I blurted out, "Leave me alone, my dog just died!" As soon as I said it, I felt horrible. That's not how I wanted to let people know.

Ask Ella

By Ella Burakowski

I am finding it difficult to cope. My colleagues and even some of my friends don't understand. One of them said, "It was just a dog, you can get another one." I can't face anyone right now. I am angry, mostly at myself for being so careless. When will I feel normal again?

Not Coping

Dear Not Coping

I am very sorry for your loss. Coco was your family member in every sense. Unfortunately, you can't make someone who has never loved a pet understand your pain. Until you have had the good fortune of experiencing the warmth and happiness you feel when your excited dog greets you at the door like you've been gone for days, or nuzzles its nose under your hand, you can't identify.

You have lost a family member, and the grief is very real. It is not an indulgence, it is a necessity, and it's normal.

Grieving for a pet is a process. You will go through all the emotions associated with grieving, and you can't rush that.

When you get back to your job, don't expect sympathy and support. It's not because your co-workers are insensitive, it's just that they can't relate to what you're going through. Not everyone is as fortunate as you to be able to know the emotional bond and love you and Coco shared.

Get through the day and lose yourself in your work. Each day will become easier as you eventually fall back into your routine.

As for the debt, pay it off as best you can. Make a payment schedule and stick to it. Put a little away from each paycheque, and think of it as the last tribute you were able to give your sweet Coco. This was not your fault. It was an accident. You have to accept that to move on.

We can all take a lesson from our furry friends. They don't judge us, they never hold a grudge, they just love us unconditionally. People who have never loved a pet can't understand this bond. Keep the memories Coco left you close in your heart. They will always comfort you and make you smile when you need them.

LACY POTATO KUGEL

6 lg Yukon Gold potatoes peeled
2 lg onions, 1 diced , 1 quartered
4 lg eggs, lightly beaten
5 tbls oil
2 -3 tsp salt
fresh ground pepper
1/4 c potato starch
1 c boiling water

Preheat oven to 500°. Saute diced onion until nicely caramelized and golden. While onion is caramelizing, grate potatoes using fine disc in the food processor. Squeeze out liquid; place in a large mixing bowl. Process onions with same blade; pour onion pulp and juices into bowl with potatoes. Stir in eggs, 5 tbsp. oil, salt, pepper, caramelized onions. Sprinkle starch on top. Pour boiling water over starch and stir thoroughly. Pour 1/4 c oil into a 9x13 baking pan; heat in oven about a min. Do not allow oil to burn. Carefully pour mixture into pan; bake 20 mins. After 20 min., reduce heat to 400°. Bake 40 min. or until the top is deep golden brown. Source: Kosher Palette Cookbook

How vivid are your memories?

I have noticed in my medical practice and my own life experience that some memories, even those very distant, when recalled are almost as vivid as when they first occurred.

When I wrote some of my life stories, which ultimately became my memoir, Brooklyn Beginnings: A Geriatrician's Odyssey, many of the experiences I recounted were so vivid that I could almost hear the voices, smell the smells and taste the flavours that accompanied the experience.

Senior Side of Life

Michael Gordon

In my geriatric medical practice, which focuses heavily on patients with some degree of cognitive impairment and dementia, memories that do get recounted from the distant past sometimes appear to the person to be almost occurring in the here and now. Family members often remark that the person cannot recall what they had for breakfast but recall in vivid detail the Atlantic crossing from Europe in 1905.

Many of my patients are Holocaust survivors. They are often plagued with distant horrific memories that are so vivid when recounted or when they intrude into consciousness that they become agitated, fearful and panicked, as they believe they are reliving the painful associations with that previous part of their life, which they may have spent many years trying to forget.

The husband of one of my patients once explained the pale faded number on his left forearm to one of my medical residents. The student was from Eastern Canada and had never met a Holocaust survivor. The man described the process of being tattooed with the number and then explained how he survived the "selection" at the concentration camp after having been transported in the cattle car from his Polish town.

He explained that the "selection" by an SS guard was the way, "it was determined who would live and who would go directly to the gas chambers." Two parallel lines were moving toward the SS officer, and the man realized that his was the gas-chamber line. When the officer turned his head, the man leaped from his line to the one next to him. As he explained, he stood up and leaped halfway across the examining room, demonstrating what he did with the fervour of his action so real that you could see that he was experiencing the act with such vividness that for the moment he was again there, making the leap that saved his life.

With this awareness of how some people, including myself, seem to have the propensity to relive some experiences with great vividness, I was excited to see a report in the Journal of Cognitive Neurosciences describing a study using complex imaging techniques that explains the neurophysiology of vivid memory recall. From this study, undertaken at the Rotman Research Centre of Baycrest with Dr. Bradley Buchsbaum as the primary investigator, it appears that the brain keeps in its memory the pathways of different experiences. These, when accessed, can repeat the circuitry of the original experience so that the memory is as if that sequence of events is taking place as vividly as in "real time."

If this is shown on further studies to be the mechanism for vivid memories, it potentially opens up new ways to treat or prevent vivid memories of terrifying experiences and perhaps even play a role in addressing the mental experience of post-traumatic stress disorder. I will follow this research story with great interest.

Dr. Michael Gordon is medical program director of palliative care at Baycrest. His latest book is Late-Stage Dementia, Promoting Comfort, Compassion and Care. Can chess make you smarter?

Viva Sarah Press
Israel21c.org

Boris Gelfand made all the right moves to become Israel's highest-ranking chess player. Now, he's partnering with an Israeli university to launch the country's first scientific research project focused on chess.

Research suggests that playing chess will improve reading performance and school grades in children.

The Grandmaster Chess Research Project is a one-of-a-kind initiative to develop a novel academic approach to the skills and culture of chess-playing that can, in turn, contribute to social and scientific development.

Those involved in the project will research the correlation between chess and cognitive enhancement; develop the first Hebrew-language educational software program for teaching chess in preschools and elementary schools, and establish an international program for training chess instructors and coaches.

"The program will provide an opportunity to achieve breakthrough research and social outreach in a field that has not yet been fully explored," said University of Haifa vice-president and dean of research Prof. Michal Yerushalmy. The researchers will examine the impact of chess on students' abilities in math, language acquisition and other areas.

Following a stunning performance at the 2012 World Chess Championship in Russia last April, Gelfand called on the Israeli government to increase its funding of the mind sport: "It's important that we continue to develop this field and initiate international competitions that will see Israeli chess players recognized."

And while the government did promise to do its part, the University of Haifa has taken it one step further.

"I am sure this will make our society better," Gelfand said during a toast to launch the new research initiative. "I know leading intellectual professionals who succeeded thanks to their playing chess in school and continued playing alongside their professional development."

Gelfand's ranking as vice-world champion is what triggered the Grandmaster Chess Research Project, researcher Shay Bushinsky said. He and the university's vice-president for external relations Amos Gaver teamed up to initiate the project.

Advanced studies in the department of computer sciences and other facilities at the university, together with the ongoing guidance of Gelfand, will ensure the prospect of achieving sophisticated research, noted Gaver.

There have been countless studies on the benefits of chess conducted throughout the world.

A study by IBM showed that learning chess improves reading performance. An Education Ministry of Moldova report found that grades increased in all subjects for young students taking part in a chess project.

"In just one year, chess [instruction] will improve a student's learning abilities, concentration, application, sense of logic, self-discipline, respect, behaviour and the ability to take responsibility for his/her own actions," said World Chess Champion Garry Kasparov, who runs a foundation that offers a chess curriculum to American schools.

"This is empirical knowledge," said Bushinsky. "We're trying to prove [it] scientifically."

Chess champion Boris Gelfand

While chess clubs are offered in many schools in Israel, the University of Haifa project could put it on the curriculum.

"It's the first time an Israeli academic institution is taking upon itself a scientific research project focused on chess," said Bushinsky, who will draw a blueprint for teaching chess in schools. "It's a joint educational and professional effort. It will be backed up with Internet and computer capabilities because this is a way to transfer the game to the public," he added.

On the international stage, Israelis were succeeding in chess even before the founding of the state.

"Israel is blessed with many elite chess players, and there's an awareness that these skills are going to vanish. We want to help facilitate and preserve these skills in the realm of an academic tribute and build a framework for professional chess training," Bushinsky said.

Chess, he adds, is an excellent vehicle for promoting linguistic and mathematical skills in children, while it helps preserve cognitive skills in older people.

In Israel, interest grew dramatically as a result of Gelfand's second-place finish at the world championship.

"The public [took note] that Israel was achieving international victories," Bushinsky said. "We want to help facilitate and preserve these skills in the realm of academia and build a framework for professional chess training."

The software for the project is for Hebrew-speakers, but Bushinsky expects it will be translated eventually into other languages. "There's a growing interest in chess as a vehicle for improving studies and disciplines of research in many fields. It's only natural that this will draw interest outside of Israel as well," he predicted.

DANI, Yeshiva U team up on lunch 'n learn

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

There is certainly more than one way to get an education: there's the book-learning way, which emphasizes the three "Rs." And there's a kind you get from seeing and doing something for the first time – something akin to hands-on learning.

A new program that's a partnership of DANI (Developing and Nurturing Independence) and Yeshiva University (YU), an Orthodox institution in New York City, is a little bit of both. DANI and YU are collaborating on a lunch 'n learn series in which Rabbi Mordechai Torczyner visits board rooms and professional offices to discuss topics that interest his guests, but from a distinctly Jewish perspective.

The "lunch" part is where things get interesting. The meals are prepared by DANI clients, young adults with special needs who work at DANI Dairy Delights, a catering business set up to expose DANI's young people to a real-life job.

Still in its early stages, the catering business has provided meals at a handful of Rabbi Torczyner's lectures.

"We teach our clients to be self sufficient," explained DANI co-founder Susie Sokol. Working in a catering business – "We're an actual business. We charge HST." – DANI clients pick up the kind of skills taken for granted by others, she said.

That includes everything from preparing food, baking, sweeping up and collecting on bills to giving change and depositing funds. "Their skills are really enhanced. My daughter can make cinnamon buns in five minutes flat," she said.

DANI's "kids," who are really young adults in their 20s and 30s, have sold their baked goods at Mount Sinai Hospital, where they put these skills to work, said Sokol. Afterwards, "they felt very proud."

"They don't want to be on the receiving end," she continued. "They want to give back to the community."

In referencing the DANI catering business, Sokol quotes an old talmudic saying: "Ein kemach, ein Torah." Translated literally, it means "Where there's no flour (bread), there's no Torah."

No doubt that lends itself to multiple interpretations, but at the lunch 'n learn series, Rabbi Torczyner provides the Torah component. As rosh kollel of the Yeshiva University-Torah MiTzion Beit Midrash Zichron Dov in Toronto, his job is to "spread Torah and Yeshiva U," he said. The lunchtime lectures provide another venue for that. When he addressed an accounting firm, he spoke about business ethics from a Jewish perspective. When a women's group invited him, he discussed the Passover festival.

Rabbi Torczyner said he models his address on the audience. For a group of lawyers, he'd bring in Jewish elements to the law.

"People are attracted to that which is most relevant to their lives," he said.

"I also try to bring in an awareness of a broader worldview as well," comparing "the Jewish component to the secular component," he added.

For Sokol, it's a win-win-win situation. The kids develop their life skills, DANI earns badly needed funds and Rabbi Torczyner gets his message out.

And the public, those who enjoy a lunchtime lecture and a good meal, learn about an otherwise "hidden" segment of our society.

"We're trying to change attitudes to get the community to meet and know our kids and build relationships. They used to be hidden. They're hidden no more. Our kids are out there and they're doing everything," Sokol said.

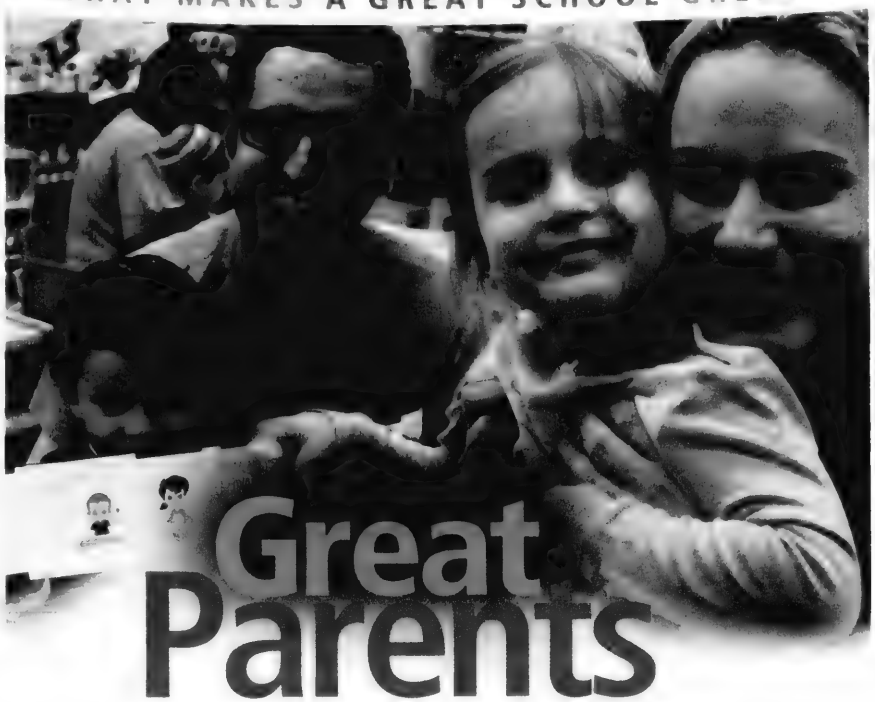
WHAT MAKES A GREAT SCHOOL GREAT?



Great Parents

Our wonderful parents are as committed as they are diverse – and we are so honoured that they have entrusted us with the education of their children.

Here's what our parents are saying about Associated:

"It's a modern school with up to date technology and strong academics but also reinforces and teaches Judaism and the values that go along with our wonderful religion."

"I love that my children, especially the older one can speak fluent Hebrew to grandparents and extended family in Israel."

"What's amazing is the warm familial atmosphere, and the willingness to accept all Jewish families and students regardless of their affiliation."

"There's a strong emphasis on academic development and learning, with knowledge translation to real life situations so that students can learn to be contributing members of the community/world around them, even at a young age."

Kids' screen time: how much is too much?

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

We've all done it as parents: dumped our kids in front of the television, or the computer, or the Nintendo DS, or the iPod, or the iPad, in order to get some downtime ourselves.

We've justified it with excuses such as "It's good for them" and "It gives them a chance to relax," but deep down, many of us worry that we're choosing to tune the kids out with digital devices purely for our own convenience.

And what, if anything, do the kids get from it?

Well, if they're younger than two or three, absolutely nothing, say the experts.

"We know young kids are better when they're actively rather than passively engaged, and TV is passive," explains Kathy Hirsh-Pasek, director of the infant language laboratory at Temple University's department of psychology in Philadelphia.

"My research on language indicates that when pre-three-year-olds watch television, it's not useful in terms of their learning – even if it's Baby Einstein. But there are kids this age in the [United States] who are watching two to three hours of TV a day, and it's prompted some companies to even come up with new remote controls that smaller kids can use."

When you stick your kids in front of technological devices, ask yourself why you're doing it first, suggests Hirsh-Pasek.

"Are you doing it because you think they're becoming a genius there, or because you need a break?"

If it's the latter, you'll be comforted to know that not all TV is bad. Research from Sesame Street and Blues Clues suggests that kids do learn from such programs, especially as they move into their preschool years.

"A half-hour show is reasonably good, but three to five hours a week is not," she says. "So what they watch has to be managed, because if they watch the wrong sorts of shows, it's bad for them. Parents also have to manage how much time their kids spend in front of the TV."

It's the sheer quantity of screen time kids get today that can be disconcerting.

"An average Canadian kid spends two hours a day in front of the TV," says Maria Rogers, an assistant professor of psychology at the University of Ottawa.

"What we don't have statistics on is how much time they're spending on all screens, and while we know there are some benefits to certain kinds of programming or applications, we know there are some negative effects of too much screen time."

Those negative effects include lack of physical activity, young kids' inability to perceive a difference between what they see on screens and what's real, and links between TV and aggression, attention spans and body image.

Clearly, parents need to set limits in a technological world that's frequently overwhelming.

Some families find it helpful to have no TVs, computers or gaming consoles in their kids' bedrooms, and taking those things out of the bedroom tends to cut screen time in half, Rogers says.

She encourages parents to set limits to screen time after certain times in the evening, as well as to create structure around the use of screen time – movie night, for example, might become just one night per week – and to think of alternatives such as using local libraries and participating in extra curricular activities with kids.

"Some families are starting to have screen-free days as a family," she says.

But it's also important to manage and monitor kids' screen time, Rogers cautions.

"Parental involvement is the key to an effective and healthy use of screen time and technology. So they need to be literate about the technology their kids are using, communicate with them about that technology in a genuinely curious, caring and interested way, and participate when possible with their kids' screen time."

Screens can be a fun way to tune out the real world and escape the pressures of school. But it's crucial for parents to remember that the process of raising strong, healthy and happy kids won't happen if their eyes are always glued to a screen.

Student art contest part of Jewish Music Week

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

When it kicked off three years ago, Jewish Music Week's student art contest attracted only a handful of entries. You couldn't expect much more from an event that was the new kid on the block and still making inroads in the community.

The 2012 first-prize winner, Grade 4

Last year, things changed. The number of submissions grew to 60, as youngsters in Jewish schools in Toronto and Hamilton put marker and paint to paper to illustrate Jewish music and what it means to them.

The quality of the artwork was so good that one of last year's winning entries, by a Grade 4 Bialik student Samara Green, was made the cover art of The Spirit of Children CD, produced jointly by the Cantors Assembly and the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism.

This year, expectations are for even more entries, as word gets out about the art contest linked to Jewish Music Week (JMW).

JMW artistic director Aliza Spiro said teachers in Jewish schools were given the heads up quite early, right after the High Holidays, that the contest is soliciting artwork from their students.

The subject of the artwork is limited only by the artist's imagination. Contestants are being asked "to draw Jewish music and that can mean anything," Spiro said.

Green's winning piece featured three people standing before a house, playing music. Sofie Kreidstein, who won the middle school category, featured a pair of violins. Her winning painting is being used in promotion for the Suzuki Violin Program at Toronto's Miles Nadal JCC.

One of Spiro's favourite pieces, a second-place finisher in the high school category by Mira Goldstein from Tiferes Bais Yaacov, resembled a medieval illuminated manuscript, with the text of a psalm celebrating God through music illustrated with representations of the instruments mentioned.

Contestants can submit their work in four age-related categories: high school, middle school, grades 1 to 3 and grades 4 and 5.

A select panel of judges, including professional artists and Art Gallery of Ontario employees, will determine the winners and runners-up. Entries will be put on display at the art gallery and the Miles Nadal JCC, and the winner will receive four tickets to JMW programs.

Deadline for entries is March 14.

Jewish Music Week was the brainchild of Spiro and her husband, Cantor Simon Spiro of Beth Tzedec Congregation, along with Cantor Steven Stoehr of Congregation Beth Shalom in Chicago. It debuted three years ago to coincide with the Cantors Assembly convention in Toronto. The Spiros thought a broader Jewish music festival could piggyback on the cantors' gathering and expose more people to Jewish music.

The festival proved to be such a success that it was repeated last year, with a wide variety of music on offer.

A program on 100 years of Jewish Hollywood proved popular, with a full orchestra accompanying vintage footage dating back to the silent era.

Another event featured the music of the late Srul Irving Glick, while other programs looked at Jewish big bands, Brazilian Jewish music and black-Jewish musical collaboration.

This year's program will include Rocky Mountain Jew-grass, with bluegrass music played with Jewish themes; the great American Jewish songbook, and a Sephardi all-girls rock band called Divahn.

Clearly when it comes to Jewish music, there's no shortage of themes. Pretty much the same holds true with artwork.

Young people recall teachers who inspired them

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Sometimes, a great teacher can change a student's life. Here are six young people whose teachers and mentors helped and inspired them to follow their dreams to some interesting career paths.

Jessica Gorlicky, a painter, says her Grade 7 homeroom teacher at Yorkhill Elementary School, in Thornhill, Ont., Kristy MacLean, taught her the importance of being understanding and aware of each person's unique perspective.

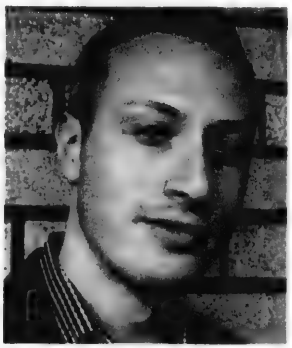
Jessica Gorlicky

The 32-year-old artist has performed her live art with Cirque du Soleil's Totem show, where she painted a four-by-five-foot backlit canvas in front of an audience. Her work often uses brightly coloured paints to depict women's bodies and faces.

Gorlicky describes MacLean as having an understanding outlook on life, instilling in her students the idea that in art, and in life, everyone looks at things in their own way.

"It was her creativity and drive in the class to show us we could do something different – that we each have a unique touch to our creative outlets," Gorlicky says. "Each individual's artwork was equal because we each had our own something special to give to the universe."

Jeff Bernstein is an entrepreneur whose business aims to provide an online platform for support networks for people with developmental and physical disabilities. The former human-rights adviser to Canadian senator Roméo Dallaire has a resume that includes working in countries such as Myanmar and South Sudan.



Jeff Bernstein

He credits Rabbi Rafi Lipner with demonstrating the power of sincerity of care in his work.

Rabbi Lipner, who taught Bernstein Tanach and rabbinics at the Anne & Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, now runs The House, which offers programming for young Jews in Toronto, and is spiritual leader of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation.

"You can go through high school and ignore a lot of what you learned, but every so often you come across that person who embodies something a little bit bigger than what you're doing in the classroom," Bernstein said of Rabbi Lipner.

"It's important when you're taking on a leadership position and being a person in the world, if you want to do everything, you have to connect with people. You're going to have a far easier time doing it if they can detect your sincerity."

Mark Masters says 10 years after working his first summer job, he is still in touch with his former boss, whom he describes as both a mentor and a teacher.

During the summer before Masters began studying journalism at Carleton University, he worked at Queen's Park, where he met Hal Vincent, who was then Queen's Park bureau chief for the Toronto radio station CFRB.

Mark Masters

"It can be really nerve-racking when you're about to go to university and you're finding your way," Masters says, explaining that Vincent gave him advice about being a journalist. "Always have your facts straight and make sure you've got the sources you need to pursue a story… and never get too upset if someone criticizes you."

Masters has carried that advice as he progressed from journalism student to professional journalist with the National Post, and now as a hockey reporter for the television station TSN.

Daniel Karasik remembers two high school teachers at Westmount Collegiate Institute in Thornhill, Ont., who supported him when he was taking his first steps toward his goal of becoming a professional playwright: his drama teacher, Andrew Dolha, and his English teacher, David Wagman.

Daniel Karasik

"They were both incredibly encouraging of my writing," says Karasik, who has seen his plays performed around the world, and last year won the grand prize in the CBC short-story competition.

In particular, Dolha's support was especially meaningful given that the teacher had been in the professional acting world shortly before teaching Karasik, so he knew what it would take to make a career in the theatre, Karasik says.

"If you want to achieve something, you've got to really want it," he says, quoting advice from Dolha. "You've got to really desire it with full intensity."

Tutor instilled 'a love of adventure'

Adam Hummel

Adam Hummel is a Toronto-based lawyer who won a leadership award last year for his work as founder of Youth Ambassadors for Peace, a project that helps communities in Kenya.

He says it was Jory Vernon, his Grade 10 history teacher at the Anne & Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, who inspired him to follow his passion – in this case, a passion for social justice.

Lahna Turner

"It was that idea which really stuck with me and with everything I've done," he says, whether it was volunteering in Kenya or helping people through his work as a lawyer.

Hummel says Vernon was an amazing teacher who was very personable and found ways to connect with students that made them feel as if they were the only person in the class.

"He put into my mind the idea of being passionate about something and being able to follow that passion," he says. "The pursuit of justice, the background reasons of why I wanted to be a lawyer come from that idea."

Lahna Turner, a comedian, says it was her elementary school tutor who inspired her in school and in life.

Turner says she had a learning disability and had to work extra hard to succeed in school. Although a number of people helped her overcome these obstacles, Wendy Sherman stood out.

"She made learning fun. She brought an excitement and she let me go off topic," Turner says, adding that she kept in touch with Sherman even into adulthood.

Sherman was in her early 20s when she headed to Africa to teach children, coming home with stories and presents for Turner, who was a child at the time, instilling in her a love of adventure. Turner followed her lead and spent time travelling after she graduated from college.

"I feel like she inspired me to dream," Turner says. "I don't think she just tutored me in school... but influenced me in life."

Students and seniors learn from each other

Baycrest resident Sarah Wolle and Toronto Heschel School student Reena Parl work together to write their own poem as part of a year-long intergenerational project.

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

The Grade 6 students at Toronto Heschel School have made some special new friends.

Earlier this school year, the students embarked on a year-long intergenerational learning project in partnership with Baycrest.

Heschel principal Gail Baker said the unique aspect of the project is that the students and the seniors are learning together. "It's not about our school entertaining the seniors, it's about bringing the experience and wisdom of the elders into the classroom."

The project began, she said, with a poetry unit in the greenhouse at the Terraces of Baycrest taught by Grade 6 teacher, Lesley Cohen.

"After the lesson, the students paired up with the seniors, and each pair developed their own poem, using the greenhouse as a metaphor," Baker said.

Following that session, the groups met at Heschel in order to share the poetry. "[The whole experience] was beyond our wildest expectations," she said. "The kids were engaged, and there was mutual admiration. The students loved their connection with the seniors, and I could feel the positive energy. I got goose bumps from watching them."

Student Jared Zacks said that working on his poetry with the residents of Baycrest, "really helped me with my ideas."

Another student, Max Abraham, said that he liked working with a partner, "and my partner taught me some new words."

For their next project, in March, the two groups plan to put on an eco-seder, Baker said. "The Grade 6 students are studying the Haggadah. They are looking for recurring examples in the story, and they are relating it to modern times.

"During a class at Baycrest, the students will present their research, and then, together with Baycrest residents, they'll make ceramic seder plates based on environmental issues."

For another topic, they will look at Jewish life through the eyes of Jewish artists, she said.

Bianca Stern, director of the department of culture, arts and innovation at Baycrest, said she joined the project "because we all believe in a creative arts approach to learning.

"As well, we believe that people can continue to learn and develop relationships throughout their lifespan. We are interested in developing cross-generational learning. Both groups benefit from the connection."

Stern, an occupational therapist by profession, said she has worked at schools, "so I have worked on both sides. This is a compelling project. There are a lot of integrated activities going on. It's special because of the arts-based focus, and because the seniors and the students are all eager to participate."

Reading stimulates white matter in kids' brains

Abigail Klein Leichman
Israel21c.org

RAMAT GAN, Israel — Complex changes in brain connections as children learn how to read have been newly revealed in a study initiated by Israeli brain science researcher Michal Ben-Shachar.

Bar-Ilan's Michal Ben-Shachar

Published in the Proceedings of the National Academy of Science, the study focuses on "white matter" – a network of pale, myelin-sheathed connections that allows information transfer between distant parts of the brain.

Ben-Shachar and a team from Stanford University – where Ben-Shachar, a professor at Bar-Ilan University, conducted her post-doctoral research — used an MRI-based non-invasive technique called diffusion tensor imaging (DTI) to track the development of reading skills and white matter connections in 55 children ages seven to 12 over a three-year period, and how they change over time.

"The nice thing about DTI is that it is really child friendly," said Ben-Shachar, who continues to collaborate with two Stanford labs in researching the development of reading in children born prematurely. "In a 12-minute scan, you can collect high-quality data from the whole brain while the child is lying still watching a movie."

The U.S. National Institutes of Health-funded study was conducted between 2004 and 2007, and collected so much data that it took years to organize and analyze it.

The results were somewhat surprising. Children who became good readers initially had lower levels of white matter in the areas of the brain associated with reading, but these levels grew rapidly during the three-year test period.

However, children who became below-average readers started out with more white matter in the areas associated with reading, and these levels declined over time — suggesting that these children were not creating and strengthening the neural pathways key to reading ability.

As they gain reading skills, children's brain connections change. [Image via Shutterstock.com]

"When we looked at the first year of collected data, in an article published last year in the Journal of Cognitive Neuroscience, it really struck us as so surprising to see a reverse correlation between white matter and reading ability," Ben-Shachar said. "This [new] paper helps us make sense of it, because we see the weaker readers start with stronger connections that decline over time."

She speculates that this may be because during the first three years of life, children grow many brain connections and then start "pruning" ones they don't use in order to strengthen the more relevant connections. "Perhaps there is not enough pruning in the brains of kids who become poor readers," she suggested.

Most developmental imaging studies compare brain measurements in groups of children and adults, while this one was unique in that it followed the same group of children over a long period of time.

"By doing so, we discovered that the changes in brain connections are more informative about reading skill than the measurement at a specific point in time," Ben-Shachar said.

"This is really important if we are ever going to use MRI as a diagnostic tool in education, in addition to standard behavioural tools. It means we will have to assess the child more than once in order to look at dynamic developmental changes, because change is more important than absolute measures at a particular time point."

At her Bar-Ilan lab, Ben-Shachar is working with Ethiopian immigrants for whom Hebrew is their first written language in the hope of identifying how the adult brain changes as literacy is acquired.

Along with Ofer Amir and Ruth Ezrati from Tel Aviv University, Ben-Shachar recently won a prestigious grant from the Israel Science Foundation to study white matter pathways in the brains of adults who stutter.

Meanwhile, she goes to California each summer to participate in the ongoing child imaging studies at Stanford.

When good isn't good enough

Cathy Indig
Special to The CJN

Imagine yourself at work. It is 15 minutes before you are supposed to present a proposal to your boss for a large contract.

As of yet, you haven't given the project a moment's thought. At this point, you sit down and scribble an incomprehensible proposal.

You walk into your meeting with your boss, knowing full well that this may be your last day on the job.

Imagine your surprise when she congratulates you on all your hard work. She goes on and on about how amazing you are.

You know full well that the work you did was not good. You didn't get lucky and produce great work. It was trash that you proposed.

You question yourself and wonder if there was a chance that the work was any good. The answer is no. The work was substandard.

Is this all that is expected of you, because she doesn't think you can do any better, or does she not expect a lot from any work that is presented?

Fast-forward to the next time you have to complete an assignment. Do you think you will be inclined to work hard at it, or do you think that all the positive feedback you received when you slapped your work together will lead you to do the same thing again?

Chances are high that you won't work too hard on this new assignment. There is no incentive to do so.

Now consider a 10-year-old doing a month-long project for school or a four-year-old doing an arts and crafts project.

If each time a child does something, he or she is told how wonderful it is, no matter how quickly, sloppily or effortlessly it's out together, what would inspire him or her to try any harder?

Praising every piece of work that a child produces will never give the child incentive to try harder. When everything is a masterpiece, what's the point of having to work harder?

You wouldn't want to insult the effort, however, there is a difference between gushing over the work and using subtle language to encourage more effort.

It is important as an educator or a parent to know the level that the child is capable of producing.

Lev Vygotsky was a famous child theorist who developed the term "zone of proximal development" (ZPD). This refers to the range of skills an individual child has.

As educators and parents, it is crucial that we find the ZPD for each child.

Monitor the child's abilities at different times. He or she will probably try harder and work longer at a task if there are no distractions, or if it is something he wants to do.

Sit down with the child and work with him or her.

If you are trying to figure out a child's ability for drawing, ask him or her to draw a circle.

If this is successful, ask the child to draw a face in the circle, and then add a body.

Make sure to stop when the child is not able to do the task without getting frustrated.

The same would apply to discovering math or reading levels.

By pushing the child to the upper limits of his ZPD, we can ensure that we are helping children develop to the best of their abilities and helping to build their self-esteem, and not stifle it.

If a child is capable only of a scribble, then not complimenting the work could be damaging. But if the child is capable of drawing with intricate details and instead only scribbles, then complimenting the scribble can be damaging.

Cathy Indig

The reason for this is twofold. One, as I mentioned before, by going goo-goo over an underachieved effort, you will not give the child an incentive to work harder. Why would he or she want to spend more time on something if praise will be given no matter what the effort?

The second reason is that by telling the child that the scribble is fabulous, you are inadvertently telling him that you don't expect that he can do any better.

Children try very hard to live up to people's expectations of them. If not much is expected, then the child doesn't feel he is smart enough to do better.

The same goes for behaviour. If we give a child the impression that we think he is mischievous, then he will most likely prove us right.

If a child believes that an adult looks at him as a rule-follower, then the child will do his or her best to live up to this.

If a child is pushed just a little, then he will be more inspired to try a little harder.

If a child is not pushed at all, he may not advance as much or as quickly as possible. The child will continue to scribble artwork, move on to print very quickly and messily, and continue to produce work without any effort.

Young brains – and older ones, too – need to be stimulated to try harder and do more complex things. You don't want to offer activities that may be too frustrating, but encouraging a child to try harder is a gift, not a hindrance to growth.

We all want to be rewarded at times for our accomplishments, but efforts should be worthy of praise. It is crucial that we know the level the child is capable of and work within those limits.

Cathy Indig is the director of early childhood education at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

Educator says teaching Jewish texts connects us to our culture

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Public schools in Israel do a great job of teaching students about their Israeliness, but they have neglected to remind them about their Jewishness.

This according to Rani Jaeger, an educator with the Be'eri School at the Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem, which is pioneering a pluralistic "nationwide model of Jewish education for Israeli high schools," according to the institute's website.

"By shifting Jewish studies from a marginal discipline into a cornerstone of secular high school education, Be'eri helps to return ownership of Jewish values, concepts and texts to Israeli youth from a range of socioeconomic and geographic backgrounds," the school said.

In Toronto last month to speak with Jewish educators about the program, Jaeger told The CJN his country's Jewish public education curriculum could learn a thing or two from North America's Jewish parochial school systems.

Historically, he said, Israel hadn't needed to reinforce Jewish identity among its student population, since the foundation of the state and its Zionist roots ensured that early generations of Israelis had Jewishness as part of the DNA of the populace.

Over time, however, with waves of new immigrants from the former Soviet Union, African nations and others, as well as the changing socio-political dynamics of a maturing country, Israel's public curricula took for granted that its student populations would always feel Jewish.

"I am a graduate of the public school system in Israel. And I graduated knowing Tanach and Jewish history… but I never actually read a page of the Talmud" while in school, he said.

"I had no notion of what was written in it. This great gap – in Israel we call it the gap between the Tanach and the Palmach [the elite fighting force of the Haganah] – between the Bible and modern times."

Jaeger said that much of the teachings in Jewish philosophy and thought, which he describes as "foundational" to Jewish identity, are missing in Israel's public school system.

"How can we expect people to be connected to Jewish culture and tradition, not necessarily religion," if these concepts from fundamental Jewish texts aren't taught to the nation's students? he asked.

This is the reason the Be'eri School was formed. It is the outgrowth of a government study done 20 years ago that concluded there was a looming "crisis" in Israel regarding Jewish identity, Jaeger said.

The Be'eri School initiative was founded in 2005.

Since then, it has managed to get its curriculum into 120 public schools in Israel – more than one-quarter of all public schools in the country – and is being taught to over 80,000 Israeli students by some 300 Be'eri-trained teachers, according to Jaeger.

The program is administrated in accordance with Israel's Ministry of Education, with which it partners and receives financial support.

"It's a national-scale program. We're not a boutique initiative. This is part of the [educational] revolution" of Israel, he said.

"What's more, is we are able to push a certain look of Judaism, one that is pluralistic, that can go hand in hand with the democratic aspects of Israel. We're trying to raise the next generation of committed, Jewish Israelis.

"There is a yearning for a new meaning for [Jewish Israeli] identity" in Israel, he said.

The Be'eri project has partners across the world. While in Toronto, Jaeger was hosted by the Lola Stein Institute as part of the Shalom Hartman Institute of North America Jewish Educators Study Forum.

North American Jewry "opened my eyes… and enabled Israelis to start something new" in education, Jaeger said.

Meeting with Canadian and American Jewish communities and "seeing the way you play your Judaism" as a minority in the country is "inspirational," he said.

Educator Rani Jaeger

Asked about how Be'eri's curriculum is perceived or received by the non-Jewish student populations in the public school system, Jaeger said it is a challenge in this regard.

He said Arab children in Israel have their own school system. However, the non-Jews in public schools in Israel, such as Druze, non-halachic Jews and migrant workers' children, generally don't mind the Be'eri curriculum, since they or their parents actively chose Jewish public school to learn more about Israel and its history.

"Still, we have to be very sensitive to the fact that these people have other traditions and may need to express these in class… it is a sensitive point," Jaeger said.

Tragedy, and especially death, can be very difficult for children, so it's important to be ready to talk to the students and help them understand the situation and work through their grief, said Diane Harvey, co-ordinator of Jewish Family & Child.

Many schools have regular social workers that come in perhaps on a weekly basis to offer their services to anybody who might need their help. However, when tragedy hits a school, JF&CS often is called in as part of a response team that helps the school community cope.

The Bialik Hebrew Day School community faced tragedy on Jan. 9, when former preschool vice-principal Rochelle Wise and her husband, David (Donny) Pichosky, were found dead in their Florida condominium. Right away, the school called in social workers, including Harvey, though she said Jewish Vocational Services took the lead on that response.

"In that case, one of the protocols we would do is speak to the staff as a group," she said, explaining they would help the staff first with the trauma, so that the teachers – who the students are presumably more comfortable with – could then explain it to the students.

There are differences in the ways social workers would explain the situation to kids of different ages, since it's important to consider how developed the children are and what kind of information they can comprehend. Younger children in particular respond best through relating to their own lives – perhaps if they've lost a relative or a pet, Harvey said.

"You acknowledge this horrible thing has happened and you try to understand the feelings," she said, adding that just talking about it is hugely important.

Diane Harvey

There were no details of what actually happened to Wise and her husband, so it became a matter of explaining to the students that there were no answers, despite the widespread speculation.

Given that this particular tragedy was so widely reported, Bialik sent out an email reminding parents and students to avoid speaking to the media out of respect for the families. The school also declined an interview with The CJN on how they explained the situation to the children.

Raquel Sultan

When dealing with grief, questions must be answered

When Netivot HaTorah Day School's incoming principal, Robin Shiner, died of leukemia last August, the school called in a social worker and therapists, said Raquel Sultan, co-ordinator of Netivot's south campus. There were also a couple of assemblies in remembrance of Shiner to help the students grieve.

Sarah Burakowski

The fact that the children were still on summer vacation when Shiner passed away meant most students had already heard the news from their parents, Sultan explained, so that made it easier for the school to respond.

However, Shiner's death was also particularly difficult for the school since almost everybody there knew her, as well as recent graduates who had moved on to high schools such as Bnei Akiva Schools, and so it became a community loss affecting a huge number of children, said Harvey, who was called into the school.

"Whether or not you had her, you knew who she was," she said. "She was beloved in the school."

As at Bialik, Harvey described the process as starting at the top and working her way down to the children. First, she debriefed the staff, including board members and especially the administration, who would have worked directly with Shiner.

"They all came in, I gave them a little psychoeducation on grief and bereavement to normalize what they're feeling, giving them very specific symptoms they might be feeling and making sure they took care of themselves," she said.

She called that part of the process a "collective debriefing." She then taught them the best way to respond to children in the classroom.

The biggest challenge in helping kids through their grief is actually explaining the concept of death, Sultan said. "It's just an idea that they're not here any more, they're not on Earth any more." She said it often helps to use stories and children's literature to answer their questions.

When a school tragedy happens outside of the school, representatives from both Jewish and public schools said they typically respond through making teachers and social workers available to speak to students, but they would not intentionally start a discussion.

This was the case after the Sandy Hook Elementary School shooting on Dec. 14 in Newtown, Conn., in which 27 people were killed. Sarah Burakowski, a special-education resource teacher for the York Region District School Board, said teachers received instructions on how to respond to questions, but there was no direction to bring up the news to students.

"They leave it up to individual teachers, since not every teacher would be comfortable dealing with it," she said.

Roderick Conte, head of guidance at Westmount Collegiate Institute, said that's the case for the high schools as well. With the Sandy Hook shooting, the board released a memo to the schools very quickly, asking the staff members to be aware that students might feel worried, however, Conte said no students approached him.

"Kids weren't that concerned, which for me is good because I get a sense that if kids in the school feel safe in the school, they're not going to get freaked out or concerned when they hear something happening in another school," he said.

Although there are social workers available to help students, the school doesn't tend to remind students about it when something tragic has happened because they don't want to create hysteria, Conte said. "If you make an announcement, essentially... you're giving kids permission to be freaked out."

However, he added that if a tragedy directly involves the school, they like to acknowledge it in hopes they will suppress the inevitable rumours.

Associated Hebrew Schools responded to the Sandy Hook shooting through an email that reminded families that teachers and the administration would address any concerns that the children may have had.

The school also reiterated the importance of school safety, and reassured the community that the school would reexamine its own safety procedures to "redouble our efforts to protect our children and community."

Ultimately, when dealing with grief, whether outside of school or directly involving the school, the most important thing is to answer the kids' questions without judgment, and to remember that children can reach out to a variety of people, said Sultan.

"When you're talking about the Jewish community, it's important to mention it's a whole team of people that are involved in here. It's the parents, the friends, the family, the teachers [and] the extended family," Sultan said. "It's just a whole team effort in helping the children dealing with grief."

Moms publish creative activity book

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Jo-Anne Schneeweiss and Shelley Sefton are firm believers in creative play and its benefits for kids. The Thornhill moms, who met through their daughters, have written a book called Creative IQ: Giving Young Learners the Creative Edge in a Competitive World.

The book, which was published last summer, has 10 themed chapters, each with 10 activities supplemented by suggestions to further enrich the projects. Well-organized and illustrated with colourful photographs, the 160-page softcover book, approximately 8-1/2 by 11 inches, was written as a resource for both parents and teachers.

Creative IQ is geared for children from 4 to 12. "We wanted to create a book that would grow with your child, that your child could keep going back to," Schneeweiss said.

A 41-year-old criminal lawyer and parenting blogger (kidsaroundcanada.com), Schneeweiss also has a background in arts, and trained as a speech and drama teacher. She became friends with Sefton, who used to teach kids' cooking classes, after their daughters met at a Jewish day school.

"We must have half-a-dozen connections," said Schneeweiss, who immigrated from Cape Town at age 6.

Sefton, 39, whose family is also from Cape Town, settled in Kingston, Ont., with her family when she was 16. "Our grandmothers were friends years back," she said. Schneeweiss and Sefton are also both alumnae of the University of Western Ontario.

Shortly after they met, Schneeweiss asked Sefton if she'd be interested in writing for her parenting blog. Sefton, who hadn't done that type of writing before, thought the idea was "awesome."

The book reflects the women's similar parenting styles, Schneeweiss said.

Creative IQ was meant as "a springboard for helping children think out of the box," she added.

Feedback thus far has been positive, the authors said. "A lot of kids like it for playdates," Sefton added.

Schneeweiss said that kids today are "so focused on technology that they don't have as many opportunities to play or develop their creativity."

Both moms limit their kids' screen time, but their children aren't bored despite the limitations, Sefton said. "I find a lot of kids turn to technology because they're bored."

Schneeweiss added, "Because we've always engaged our children in creative play, they create their own activities, and they inspire us every day. They've taken what they've learned to the next level. "Every child has the potential to be creative."

She added that the time parents spend with children doing creative activities is "not only important for creative development, it's fun and it creates memorable time together."

The book teaches children how to use technology in positive ways, Sefton said. Some of the "challenges" proposed in the book involve online research.

Other activities include arts and crafts, and there is often a food element. The "winter" chapter – Creating in a Winter Wonderland – has instructions for making an igloo from sugar cubes.

Sefton, who arrived in Canada from South Africa during a snowstorm, said she loves the winter chapter. "I embrace winter. It's beautiful… There's so much to do, so much that winter has to offer."

The book's first chapter, Chocolatta… Hard to Resist, has a recipe for chocolate baklava, inspired by a family outing to Taste of the Danforth, in Toronto's Greektown.

As well, there is a recipe for chocolate playdough. "It tastes terrible," Sefton said, "but you won't die if you eat it."

Games, discussion topics, and a themed party help round out the chapter, and the authors highlight the skills enhanced by each activity.

Sefton, who taught cooking at Camp Shalom as a student and then wrote a children's cookbook using her camp recipes, said that when she taught cooking classes, she tried to combine fun with an educational aspect.

"Cooking was always my passion," said Sefton, who went to chef school at George Brown College and has a background in recipe development.

"If you have the confidence to bake a cake, you can change the world," Schneeweiss said. "The whole idea is to give the children confidence in all different areas, so they'll be able to meet the challenges they have in life."

It has to do with taking small steps, Sefton explained.

Schneeweiss also noted that many of the ideas in the book are inexpensive. "The book is there as a resource, so when they do have that quality time, they can easily access it."

Writing the book over an 18-month period was fun, Sefton said. "It wasn't a job… It was stimulating time with another adult."

The book is available through Creative IQ Media (creativeiq.ca), amazon.ca, and in select bookstores. Shipping is free through March.

How to get good at something? Practice!

Erica Brown
JNS.org

Legend has it that famed violinist Isaac Stern (1920-2001) was once confronted after a concert by an admirer who said the following to him: "Oh, Mr. Stern, I would give anything to be able to play the violin as magnificently as you do." Stern's answer: "Would you give 12 hours a day?"

He probably wasn't exaggerating.

Stern was born in Poland but moved to the United States with his family before he was two years old. By 15, he had his debut as a violinist and spent decades travelling the world with his music. In his lifetime, he discovered and nurtured talent, bringing to the public eye the famous cellist Yo-Yo Ma and others.

He first played in Israel one year after the founding of the Jewish state and maintained a close relationship with Israel, visiting and playing during wartime.

An obituary in the Los Angeles Times records the moment when Stern's performance was interrupted during an air raid siren in Israel. To calm the audience, he played a piece of Bach. The audience put on their gas masks and watched the rest of the performance.

Carnegie Hall's main auditorium is named after Stern, and it's not hard to understand why. The talent Stern exhibited in his youth was honed and developed over a lifetime of playing and discovering the talents of others. Maimonides, citing the Talmud writes, "According to the effort is the gain." And it reminds me of a talmudic debate that also involves 12 hours. The sages believed that study demands rigour: hours, discipline and self-sacrifice. They believed the life of scholarship was earned without luxury. To acquire wisdom meant sleeping on the floor and eating bread dipped in salt. This wasn't a prescription for knowledge. It was a warning against those who believed that study would bring them material success and status.

Study alone would not support a family, so one of the debates around Jewish scholarship was how much time should be given to learning Torah in contrast to earning a living. One formula favoured in the Talmud is a three to nine ratio: three hours of work (often manual labour) and nine hours of learning. We wonder how this worked in reality, but then again this is the talmudic equivalent of Isaac Stern in the scholarship department. You can't create great scholars unless there is real investment in both the process of study, the skills and competencies that are necessary and the commitment to mastery. Being a lifelong learner is all about sequentially preparing ourselves to make study more nuanced, textured and challenging across the lifespan.

The 10,000 hours rule was popularized by Malcolm Gladwell in his best-selling book Outliers. Gladwell used research that suggested that mastery in any field depends on spending at least 10,000 hours perfecting one's skills and competencies. Others, like Geoffrey Colvin in Talent is Overrated, write about the importance of deliberative practice. It's not only about how many hours you put in but about customized practice that helps you improve on your specific areas of weakness. One of the great tests of talent is one's willingness to practise what one is not good at and willingness to practice alone.

Sometimes we want outcomes without effort, but current research suggests what our sages knew 2,000 years ago. It takes 12 hours a day, 10,000 hours a life and mental and physical drive to achieve excellence. What would you like to be great at, and are you willing to put in the hours?

Meet the new Miss Israel

Yityish Aynaw, a former Israeli army officer, became the first Ethiopian-Israeli to win the Miss Israel pageant. The 21-year-old model came to Israel with her family when she was 12. During the competition, Aynaw cited the slain American civil rights activist Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. as one of her heroes. "He fought for justice and equality, and that's one of the reasons I'm here. It's important that a member of the Ethiopian community wins the competition for the first time," Aynaw told the judges. "There are many different communities of many different colours in Israel, and it's important to show that to the world." [Flash90 photo]

Turkish PM vilifies Israel

Brands Zionism 'crime against humanity'

Raphael Ahren
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Canada and the United States denounced remarks made last week at a UN conference by Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan, who described Zionism as a "crime against humanity" on par with antisemitism and fascism.

Rick Roth, spokesperson for Canadian Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird, told The CJN that Canada "categorically rejects" Erdogan's "unacceptable" comments and that his "inflammatory statements do nothing to advance the cause of peace or effective cross-cultural dialogue."

"Such misguided sentiments only give expression to a dangerous, insidious form of new antisemitism," he said.

Meanwhile, U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry called Erdogan's comments "objectionable." The White House issued a separate statement labelling the remarks "offensive and wrong."

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu also condemned Erdogan's statement, calling it a "dark and slanderous remark, the likes of which we thought had passed from the world."

Speaking on Feb. 27 in Vienna at the fifth UN Alliance of Civilizations Global Forum, a conference devoted to dialogue between the West and Islam, Erdogan decried rising racism in Europe and the fact that many Muslims "who live in countries other than their own" often face harsh discrimination.

"We should be striving to better understand the culture and beliefs of others, but instead we see that people act based on prejudice and exclude others and despise them," Erdogan said, according to a simultaneous translation provided by the United Nations. "And that is why it is necessary that we must consider — just like Zionism or antisemitism or fascism — Islamophobia as a crime against humanity."

Lawyer Dying

VICTORIA — The lawyer who has defended every major Holocaust denier, neo-Nazi and accused war criminal in Canada over the past 30 years is dying of liver cancer. Doug Christie, 66, was in hospital last week in Victoria and confirmed that doctors say he has six months to live. Among his clients have been former teachers Jim Keegstra and Malcolm Ross, Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel, white supremacists John Ross Taylor and Wolfgang Droege, disgraced native leader David Ahenakew, and accused war criminals Imre Finta and Michael Seifert. Christie was first diagnosed in November 2011 with prostate cancer, which has apparently spread, the Victoria Times-Colonist reported last week.

Drabinsky Appeals

TORONTO — Former film and live-theatre mogul Garth Drabinsky is challenging the ruling to strip him of his Order of Canada. Drabinsky is asking the Federal Court to review the decision by the council that awards and revokes the honour, saying he was in jail and thus unable to argue his case to the panel. Gov.-Gen. David Johnston signed the order against Drabinsky last fall. It was to be formally announced March 2. Drabinsky was jailed in 2009 for fraud for cooking the books of his Livent live-theatre company, which later went bankrupt. He was paroled last month after 17 months in jail. The advisory panel has never reconsidered a case like this before, the Toronto Star reported.

Downtown Shul Sold

OTTAWA — Congregation Beth Shalom in downtown Ottawa has sold its land, the Conservative shul's president told the Ottawa Citizen. Ian Sherman said Trinity Property Investments has agreed to buy the property for $15 million, plus $9 million more if the city allows greater density on the site. Those are the same terms offered by Claridge Homes, which walked away from a similar deal late last year. The 350-member shul, the last in downtown Ottawa, can't afford to maintain the 60-year-old complex, which used to house a JCC and community offices. The closing date for the deal is Dec. 31. Trinity refused to confirm the price it's paying for the property. A 90-day conditional period on the sale expires May 8.

Observant Jew To Head U.S. Treasury Dep't

WASHINGTON — With a strong bipartisan majority, the U.S. Senate confirmed Jack Lew, President Barack Obama's nominee to be Treasury secretary.

Lew, formerly Obama's chief of staff, was confirmed Feb. 27 in a 71-26 vote, with 20 Republicans voting for him. Lew, from New York, becomes the first-ever Orthodox Jew to hold a federal U.S. cabinet position.

Jack Lew

He also has served twice – under presidents Clinton and Obama – as chief of the Office of Management and Budget (OMB) and, under Obama, as a deputy secretary of state.

Lew faced questions over a $685,000 severance payment he got when he resigned as executive vice-president of New York University. He also met resistance from Republicans who said Lew, as OMB chief, was too closely identified with the current budget impasse.

Nonetheless, his solid majority was in contrast to Chuck Hagel, Obama's defence secretary nominee, who garnered the support of just four Republicans and was approved earlier the same week by a majority of 58.

WORLD

Boycott Motion Fails

LONDON — A Feb. 27 motion calling for blanket sanctions against Israel was rejected by the Oxford University Students' Union. According to the website of Britain's Union of Jewish Students, the measure calling for the student union to boycott Israeli institutions, goods and produce lost by a vote of 69-10, with 15 abstentions.

Supreme Court upholds Sask. human rights law

Jewish groups welcome decision

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The Supreme Court of Canada struck down a part of Saskatchewan's hate legislation, but left intact the section that makes it an offence to promote hatred against identifiable groups.

In a unanimous 6-0 decision released last week, the court ruled that a section of the Saskatchewan Human Rights Code that prohibited expression that "ridicules, belittles or otherwise affronts the dignity" of protected groups is invalid. It "does not rise to the level of ardent and extreme feeling constituting hatred required to uphold the constitutionality of a prohibition of expression in human rights legislation," wrote Justice Marshall Rothstein for the court.

The judges ruled, however, that once those words were struck, the remaining section of the code remained valid, even though it infringed the Charter's Section 2 right to freedom of expression. Restricting that right was demonstrably justifiable in a free society as a means of preventing hate speech and protecting minority groups, the Supreme Court ruled.

Shimon Fogel

The decision arose out of a case involving William Whatcott, who was brought before the Saskatchewan Human Rights Commission (SHRC) after four complaints alleged he distributed flyers in 2001 and 2002 that promoted hatred against homosexuals.

The SHRC was appealing a 2010 ruling by the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal that overturned a human rights tribunal finding against Whatcott.

The Supreme Court threw out complaints based on two of the flyers, while upholding the other two. He was ordered to pay penalties amounting to $7,500, down from $17,500 ordered by a provincial human rights tribunal.

The court's decision was applauded by Jewish organizations that have long advocated retention of provincial anti-hate laws. (The ruling did not affect the Criminal Code's anti-hate provisions.)

B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights, which was an intervener in the case, said the court "struck the right balance between freedom of speech and hateful speech – the first is to be respected, the latter is to be condemned when it crosses the line."

Canadian Jewish Congress, which also intervened in the case, is now defunct, but its successor organization, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), also supported the decision.

Jerusalem, the PA, the Jews

From the editor's desk...

Nothing more clearly illustrates how the Palestinian leadership has transformed the conflict with Israel from a territorial one into a religious one than their views on the Jews and Jerusalem.

It is now widely known that then-U.S. president Bill Clinton could not believe his ears when Yasser Arafat denied any historical Jewish connection to Jerusalem. There was no evidence that a Jewish temple had ever stood in Jerusalem, Arafat, who was Palestinian Authority president, casually offered at Camp David in discussion with Clinton and Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak.

Arafat's remarks were not political postures. They were deeply believed doctrine, a distorted outcropping from the perverse political theology that informs Palestinian policy and politics toward the Jews.

Last week, once again, Palestinian religious leaders made their Jews-and-Jerusalem policies quite clear.

In anticipation of a possible visit later this month to the Temple Mount in Jerusalem by U.S. President Barack Obama, Hamas warned the American leader to stay away. It would be "a diplomatic disaster" the terror group said.

Preferring to present a kinder face to America (and to the Christian world) than his Hamas co-religionists, Ekrima Sabri, head of the High Islamic Council in Jerusalem, softened the "no-visit" policy by imposing three conditions upon the president for such a visit: access to the Mount could not be from the Mughrabi Gate (i.e., from the side of the Western Wall); there must be no Israeli official with the president; and the visit must be for tourist purposes, not political ones (not to discuss peace negotiations with Israel).

Sabri specifically said he would complain to the president about Israel's attempts to "Judaize Jerusalem."

The affront by the Palestinian leaders was a double one: first to the office of the presidency as well as to the individual who holds it; and second, of course, to history, to truth and to the possibility of religious coexistence with the Jews.

Other than as perennial wanderers who may have passed through the ancient walled city over the millennia, the Jews have no historic connection to Jerusalem, the PA believes.

But there was also a broadside against Jewish patrimony in the Old City fired by a non-Palestinian organization. This one came from the "friendly" corridors of the European Union.

Some weeks ago, the EU diplomats in eastern Jerusalem wrote a report to their foreign ministries and to the complete roster of the 27-member EU states. In it, they recommended economic sanctions against Jewish settlements in the West Bank and eastern Jerusalem. The report was delivered in camera to the European governments in January and leaked last week to Ha'aretz.

Its language is unambiguously harsh and uncompromisingly severe. The message that the European diplomats conveyed in various iterations and restatements of their report was a call for a boycott of the Jews in the West Bank.

For example, one of the recommendations urges EU countries to "prevent, discourage and raise awareness about problematic implications of financial transactions including foreign direct investments, from within the EU in support of settlement activities, infrastructure and services."

Some recommendations call for direct or indirect sanctions on companies and organizations involved in settlement construction and divestment from Israeli firms.

These recommendations are obnoxiously, grossly unfair and based upon bad readings of history and worse application of international law. But they are the jagged blade of an unkind polemics that knowledgeable individuals and ignoramuses alike thrust constantly into Israel's standing in the world. Though we cavil and complain, we are, alas, used to it.

However there was more, and I might add, much worse in the report. According to JTA, a large part of the report accuses Israel of restricting Muslim and Christian religious practice in Jerusalem. It accuses Israel of attempting to change the religious character of Jerusalem. The report also calls the construction of Jewish neighbourhoods in eastern Jerusalem "systematic, deliberate and provocative."

This part of the EU report is far more egregious than bad history or bad law.

It is blatant distortion and falsification. It makes the EU complicit in the Islamic effort to deny a Jewish heritage in the Old City. It makes the EU confederates in the Islamic attempt to once again expel the Jews from Jerusalem.

The anti-Israel prejudice rots even deeper when one recalls that the EU pointedly refuses to regard Hezbollah as a terrorist organization. –*MBD

WOMEN CONTRIBUTE TO THE WAR EFFORT AT HOME

During World War II, many women contributed to the war effort at home by volunteering. Various organizations helped to co-ordinate these initiatives. In 1940, a service flight training school was established in Brantford, Ont., and airmen from all over the British Commonwealth began training there. In this photograph taken between 1939 and 1945, a group of Jewish women volunteers are being shown how to fold a parachute by two military servicewomen. Identified in this photo, from left, are the school officer, Anne Tulchinsky; Kay Solomon; Rose Bloom and Mrs. Furman of New York. [Ontario Jewish Archives photo]

An exhibit of rare photographs from the doomed Lodz Ghetto in Nazi-occupied Poland is now on display at York University's Osgoode Hall Law School library.

The mostly black-and-white photographs, commissioned by the German-controlled Jewish Council, were taken between 1940 and 1944 and document everyday life in the ghetto, the last one in Poland to be liquidated.

The exhibit, The Face of the Ghetto: Pictures by Jewish Photographers from the Lodz Ghetto 1940-1944, is funded by the German Federal Foreign Office and runs until March 17.

Curated by the Topography of Terror Foundation in Berlin in co-operation with the Polish State Archive in Lodz, it has been brought here by York University's Mark and Gail Appel Program in Holocaust and Anti-Racism Education, the Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies at York University, the Azrieli Foundation and the consulates general of Germany and Poland in Toronto.

First exhibited in Germany three years ago, the photographs were previously displayed in the visitors lobby of the United Nations and Old Dominion University in Norfolk, Va.

When the exhibit opened at UN headquarters in New York City last year, Germany's ambassador to the United Nations, Peter Wittig, said the photographs conveyed "the pretense of a normal, functioning life."

As he put it, "While we see some pictures with children still smiling and ghetto inhabitants leading a seemingly regular working life, we know that already at that point of time, when these pictures were taken, the killing of exactly these persons was already being planned."

Lodz, an industrial centre with a population of 672,000, of whom 230,000 were Jewish, was occupied by the German army in September 1939. It was renamed Litzmannstadt, after a World War I German general, in April of the following year.

The ghetto, measuring 4.1 square miles, was established in Baluty, the poorest district in the city, and 160,000 Jews were crammed into it.

From the autumn of 1941 onward, an additional 25,000 Jews from western European cities, including Frankfurt, Vienna and Prague, were deported to the ghetto. At least 5,000 Sinti and Roma from Austria were also transported there.

Ghetto workers produced goods for Germany and particularly the German army. Chaim Rumkowski, head of the ghetto council, believed that "honest and useful work" would ensure the ghetto's survival. "Work is our only chance," he declared.

But the Nazis, acting on a plan approved in 1942 to exterminate the Jews of Europe on a systematic basis, never intended to let its inhabitants survive and by the end of the Holocaust, only five per cent of the Jews of Lodz survived the Holocaust.

Incredibly enough, a substantial number of photographs from the ghetto exist, thanks in large part to a Jewish Council decision in August 1940 to create a photographic office within the ghetto's statistics department.

Photographs of the ghetto were also snapped by Walter Genewein, head of the finance department of the Nazi ghetto administration, and by an ethnic German policeman named Steiner. Their portrayals of ghetto Jews were generally tinged with antisemitism.

The more than 50 photographs at York University are but a tiny fraction of the 12,000 small-format prints commissioned by the Jewish Council and held today in the Lodz State Archives. The stark photographs, as one inscription reads, portray "short-lived moments of harmony and joy, even happiness, and "a remarkable will to preserve humanity despite the inhuman reality."

Passover food drive needs donations, volunteers

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

For 30 years, National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto section's Passover Food Drive has made the holiday easier for Jews in need.

That need has increased since 1983, when the drive started with the delivery of 25 boxes of food, and now volunteers pack and deliver more than 2,500 boxes across the GTA.

Recipients include people living in poverty, recent immigrants in need and people with disabilities. They're referred from agencies, synagogues, schools, service groups and chaplaincy services.

Each box contains such items as matzah, gefilte fish, tuna, canned fruit, matzah ball mix with soup, Passover wine, a Haggadah, candles and sweets, and they're packed by volunteers from schools, groups and organizations.

Janice Landy, a member of the food drive committee, which is chaired by Karen Fenwick and Bonnie Dale, said there are 40 volunteer groups this year.

"Before they begin packing, the groups are given a 10-minute talk on poverty. We also tell them that the boxes are a gift to the recipients and ask them to include a signed card in the box."

Landy said the drive desperately needs money.

"We usually put away a little money from the previous year's drive to help start up the current year, but the drive had financial problems last year, so we weren't able to put aside much money."

The committee has made cutbacks and has saved money in a number of areas, Fenwick said, but neither the client list nor the contents of the boxes has been affected.

Drive organizers have set up bins in supermarkets and other places across the city for people to donate non-perishable food items marked "Kosher for Passover 2013," she said, but "we really need money. We are able to buy food wholesale and can buy twice as much food. The money can go a long way."

The committee is also in need of volunteers to deliver the boxes on March 17, Dale said. "We need drivers who have a car and a helper. Delivery day comes out on March Break this year, so we're a little concerned about getting enough volunteers."

She said that people who have delivered boxes have come back and told her what an eye-opener it was.

"They had never realized that there was so much poverty in the Jewish community. There are people who are unemployed and underemployed, and there are a disproportionate number of elderly women and those who are disabled or have a mental illness."

Landy said she has never forgotten one nine-year-old boy who volunteered to pack the boxes. "He said that when his family arrived in Canada, they received a box, and they were very grateful. Now, he gets to pack the boxes, which go to others in need."

Volunteers can show up on delivery day at 4700 Bathurst St. between 8:30 and 11:30 a.m.

"It is important to donate money, but volunteering time is also important. People need to be hands-on, and see what is happening out there," Landy said.

Erdogan's poison

The murky musings and outrageous outbursts by Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan about Israel no longer surprise. They spring from a mind that is a wellspring of poison against the Jewish state.

Irrespective of the podium or the place – whether in Davos, Switzerland, at a forum of international business, in Cairo with the leaders of the most populous Arab country in the world, in New York at the United Nations, or as last week in Vienna at an international conference dedicated to dialogue between the West and Islam – Erdogan is unrestrained in his anti-Israel fulminations. Neither decency, nor truth, nor reason, nor rational thought, for that matter, holds him back.

In Vienna, the Turkish leader declared Zionism to be a crime against humanity. This latest disparagement of Israel was of a piece with his many previous calumnies, only baser, lower and even more ignorant. And for that reason, it was no doubt a balm to the ears of the leaders of Iran, Hamas, Hezbollah, Al Qaeda and all the rest of their ilk. For whatever defames Israel commends their own causes, which we can usually identify by the dripping trail of blood they leave in their wake.

With words that could have been spoken by the late, revered Rev. Martin Luther King, Erdogan attempted to make the case for tolerance and mutual respect among peoples. "We should be striving to better understand the culture and beliefs of others, but instead we see that people act based on prejudice and exclude others and despise them," Erdogan said.

In the very next breath however, he fumed prejudice at Israelis, very explicitly excluded Zionism from the realm of humankind and very vividly despised the national movement of the Jewish people.

His earnest plea for understanding was nothing more than public relations piffle. Indeed, what would the Kurds or the Armenians say about Erdogan's efforts to better understand their culture and beliefs?

It was heartening to see the strong reactions of disapproval to Erdogan's statement by many leaders and politicians. But the condemnations of Erdogan in the West will not stanch the flow of the hate-inducing poison into the uninformed minds and vulnerable hearts of the Middle East and beyond.

Even as Erdogan raged against Zionism, the Turkish media, according to Tazpit News Agency, reported that a senior member of the Turkish government, former finance minister Kemal Unakitan, had recently spent some 2-1/2 months in Israel (or the Zionist entity, as Israel's enemies like to call the country) for advanced medical treatment to try to avoid the need for a kidney transplant and end his dialysis treatments. Unakitan is slated to return to Israel to continue with his medical care.

Someone should tell Erdogan.

For the first time since the start of unrest in Gaza and the West Bank in late 1987, Palestinians used explosives and firearms against Israeli security personnel. The incident involved a bomb placed on a bypass highway near Gaza City that was detonated as two vehicles passed. Gunmen then opened fire with small arms on the vehicles. No injuries were reported.

Elephant in the room

Your editorial calling for a searching discussion about "the elephant in the room," the unsustainable cost of Jewish education, deserves attention and action ("Summit on education," Feb. 14). Since 2007, when Ontario voters decisively rejected public funding for religious day schools, Toronto's Jewish leadership has dropped the ball. There has been no public process and no serious search for ways to relieve the intolerable burden of day-school tuition on middle-income families. Since 2001, day-school tuition increases have been more than double the rise in the cost of living. Cost is a huge barrier and the situation is getting worse.

Research shows that attendance at Jewish day schools exerts the most powerful influence over subsequent life choices. After-school classes, Israel trips and summer camps also have measurable positive effects. We need to involve the whole community in a thoughtful review of the issues. We need to ask hard questions, including:

- What principles should guide the community's approach to funding Jewish education?
- What goals should the community adopt in Jewish education? For example, as a target, how many Jewish students should we aim to see enrolled in the day schools? In supplementary schools? In Jewish camps? In heritage-language programs in the public schools?
- What exactly is the affordability problem? How will it change, given the demographic outlook?
- What could market research tell us about the preferences and decision-making of parents?
- What share of community funding should be allocated to education and subsidizing tuition?
- Can day-school costs be constrained or reduced?
- What is the appropriate level of community support for all the forms of Jewish education?
- How can we raise the funds needed to provide meaningful relief and achieve better outcomes?

I support the call for a summit to come together and examine Jewish education in all its future possibilities. But this should be a process and not a one-shot event. It will take preparation to put facts and not just opinions on the table. I call on UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to take up the challenge and create the serious, inclusive and fact-based process we need to answer the hard questions.

Israel treated wounded Syrians

One has to be proud of the Israel Defence Forces soldiers who brought the seven wounded Syrians into Safed's Ziv Medical Center for treatment on Feb. 16. Perhaps, when they sufficiently recover from their wounds, might I suggest they be taken to the school in Ma'alot, some 35 kilometres away, where in 1972, 22 Israeli Jewish schoolchildren on a school trip from Safed were massacred by the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine. I am sure this experience for them will be, one hopes, a fitting conclusion to their brief visit to Israel.

Doctor-assisted suicide

I was dismayed by Norma Baumel Joseph's column, "Death with dignity," (Feb. 7), against doctor-assisted suicide. I am a social worker who initiated Jewish Family & Child's Jewish Hospice Program in Toronto in 1993 and co-ordinated it for 13 years. The hospice program consists of a multi-disciplinary team of social workers, doctors, trained volunteers and a rabbi. Our mandate was at the beginning – and still is in its continuation today – to help people die in the comfort of home with family and friends. During my tenure as the hospice's co-ordinator, I worked with 1,300 dying people and their families. My experience taught me that most people value life to the last minute and do not ask for assisted suicide. On the other hand, there is a minority of people whose suffering is so great that they beg for help to die. I do not call doctor-assisted suicide "dying with dignity." I call it relief from unbearable suffering.

We need a nuanced view of antisemitism in Germany

Mark Webber

Antisemitism in Germany is a subject that never loses its currency. In 2012, the topic gave rise to some welcome light – including a major parliamentary report on antisemitism and a provocative analysis of intolerance, prejudice, and discrimination in Europe, by the Friedrich Ebert Foundation – but also considerable heat.

The discussions, like the phenomenon itself, are stubborn and ongoing. But the events that attracted the most attention in the past year were, in addition to the physical attack on a rabbi in Berlin last August, literary and legal. Last April, Nobel Prize winner Günter Grass published the poem What Must Be Said, singling out Israel as a "danger to world peace." In May, a lower court in Cologne held that religiously mandated circumcision of boys, even with their parents' consent, was a criminal offence (the equivalent of assault causing bodily harm). In November, as the German version of Tuvia Tenenbom's I Sleep in Hitler's Room was about to appear, a hue and cry, including the usual slurs, arose about the author's putative prejudice against Germans. And just at year's end, the Simon Wiesenthal Center named German journalist and publisher Jakob Augstein one of the 10 worst antisemites of the year worldwide. All of these incidents provoked attention and ongoing debate inside and outside the country.

Last month, these public flashpoints, but also the less visible, underlying issues and problems of anti-Jewish attitudes and actions, in Germany and Europe, were the subject of a two-day conference on "Antisemitism Today" organized by the Office for Civic Education of Ontario's partner state in Germany, Baden-Württemberg. The conference was attended by some 90 scholars, teachers, teacher-trainers, memorial site educators, antiracism interveners, police officers and experts on political extremism of all stripes.

As the only non-European at the conference, and as someone professionally active in the field of registering, analyzing and countering antisemitism, I am both encouraged and disturbed by what my latest visit to Germany brought to light.

First the good news: there is no shortage of well-informed and alert Germans of all ages who are informed about the history and present state of antisemitism in their country, and who are determined to (1) prevent it to the extent possible, and (2) respond resolutely whenever it does manifest itself.

Now the bad news: there is also no shortage of occasions that demand precisely this special combination of knowledge, skill, and commitment.

Not that antisemitism is any more widespread in Germany than elsewhere in Europe. In fact, statistics presented at the conference indicate that Germany is not a European "leader" in antisemitic attitudes. But there is no doubt that it exists there and has pernicious effects for society in general and Jews in particular.

The public episodes, disturbing as they are, are less important than the "everyday antisemitism" that lurks beneath the surface, occasionally rising to visibility. On the other hand, these very public "scandals" provide ample and necessary opportunities to reflect on the shape and extent, as well as the causes of and possible responses to, antisemitism in Germany and elsewhere.

In Canada, we sometimes assume that antisemitism in Germany is primarily a continuation of National Socialist policies and practices. This assumption and Tenenbom's book notwithstanding, the threat of a "Fourth Reich" is, given Germany's vibrant democracy, not even a remote possibility.

Two women in Berlin stroll through the memorial for the Holocaust. The author states that "secondary" antisemitism arises in Germany today from the desire to keep feelings of guilt for the Holocaust at bay. [RNS photo]

Far more prevalent today is a distinctive kind of "reactive" antipathy to Jews that is captured in the oft-quoted quip: "We can never forgive the Jews for what we did to them." This "secondary" antisemitism arises, in other words, from the desire to keep feelings of guilt for the Holocaust at bay. There are important demographic differences – by age group and background (including whether one grew up in the former "East" or "West" Germany) – in the prevalence of this kind of antisemitism. Nevertheless, secondary antisemitism seems to be a greater problem in Germany today than "primary" antisemitism (which nonetheless remains an issue).

The debates on the putatively antisemitic content of the writings of Augstein and Grass illustrate another main facet of current German antisemitism: its connection to Israel and the Middle East conflict. In Germany as elsewhere, the debate is often (mis-)framed as an issue of "censorship versus free speech," as in: "It must be legitimate to criticize injustice etc. wherever it occurs." Of course, nobody knows this better than Israelis, who are not reticent about expressing their conflicting opinions on their country's policies and practices.

But as one of the experts at the conference, Prof. Andreas Zick of the University of Bielefeld, argued, Israel-critical attitudes in Germany are often associated with aspects of "primary" and/or "secondary" antisemitism as well as with one or more of the following sentiments he categorizes as antisemitic: (1) denying Israel's right to exist and defend itself; (2) applying a double standard to Israel and/or obsessing on the country's perceived failings; (3) attributing responsibility for Israel's policies and actions to all Jews collectively; (4) applying antisemitic stereotypes to Israel, especially comparisons with Nazi Germany (or, I would add, apartheid South Africa).

And here is the main point: the analyses of Zick and his colleagues indicate that while just under 20 per cent of Germans who criticize Israel are free of antisemitic motives, the large majority of those whose responses are critical of Israel also hold attitudes considered indicative of antisemitism.

Of course, Zick is talking about responses to questionnaires, not actual instances of editorials, poems, or political speeches, or utterances or actions in public or private. In these cases, it is essential to think about and analyze the particular incident, content, statement, speaker, audience, and intention before deciding whether antisemitism is present. This applies also to the writings of Grass and Augstein. For example, a number of prominent members of the German Jewish community have criticized the Wiesenthal Center's branding Augstein as one of the world's worst antisemites, arguing that the U.S.-based Wiesenthal Center is not sufficiently informed about how public debate is conducted in German and in Germany and is too ready to "play the antisemitism card."

The cases of Augstein and Grass, and the circumcision debate, point to the need to understand the specific context as well as to the prominence of "left-wing" or "enlightened" prejudices against Israel and/or Jewish tradition and practice.

Although the circumcision verdict arose in the context of Muslim practice, the debate quickly switched to a primarily Jewish issue when it became apparent that prohibiting brit milah would make it impossible for many Jews to continue to live Jewish lives in Germany. The German government wasted no time in signalling its intention to introduce a bill expressly allowing circumcision for religious reasons, and in December 2012, the Parliament passed such a law with the support of 75 per cent of its members.

Yet according to surveys, the new law is very unpopular. Part of the opposition comes from those who don't like Muslims or Jews or both, or from those who, for whatever reasons, resent granting these minority groups "special accommodations." But a not inconsiderable part of the opposition, in Parliament and in the general public, originates from certain segments of the political left, including some intellectuals who consider all forms of religious belief and practice (including both the brit milah and shchitah) to be outdated and repugnant superstition, anathema to logic and reason, and, by extension, undemocratic.

Antisemitism in Germany, as elsewhere, is a complex phenomenon stemming from a multiplicity of factors and expressing itself in a variety of forms. It comes from the right and the left, from the uneducated and educated, from Christians, Muslims, atheists and occasionally Jews. And the prevention and remedies are correspondingly varied and complicated.

The fact that antisemitism is so often in the German news, that it can always be counted on to create headlines and controversy, should not be taken to mean that it is more widespread, or more dangerous, in Germany than elsewhere. In fact, it is encouraging that this is not only is the case, but also that antisemitism is rejected, challenged and actively opposed by so many.

But as the conference also made clear, it is necessary to do still more to prevent, expose, and actively oppose antisemitism in all its manifestations. This can only happen on the basis of expertise and commitment. And ensuring that these tools are available requires continuing support of all kinds from government and civil society. This was one of the main appeals emanating from the conference.

Antisemitism is a persistent and worrisome fact of life in Germany and the rest of Europe. Germany's history of National Socialism means that antisemitic attitudes and actions there will always be subject to special scrutiny. But we in North America should resist rushing to level generalized and ill-informed accusations against "the Germans" today. That would be neither accurate nor fair. And it could distract us from our own considerable problems with homegrown antisemitism in Canada.

Mark Webber is an emeritus professor of German studies at York University, where he was the founding director of the Canadian Centre for Germans and European Studies and co-initiator of the Mark and Gail Appel Program in Holocaust and Antiracism Education. For his contributions to mutual understanding between Canadians and Germans, and between Jews and non-Jews, he was awarded the German equivalent of the Order of Canada.

Let's give Canadian Forces veterans more respect

In parshat Ki Tisa, Moses is instructed to take a census of the males aged 20 and older. In days gone by, a census was taken for two purposes: to levy taxes and to register an army. In Moses' day, an army came together for a current war, then returned to civilian life, until the next time.

Today, the Canadian Forces consists of volunteers who serve fixed tours of duty. We demand that they risk their lives in our defence and, at other times, the defence of people far, far away, hence their presence in Afghanistan. What does that mean for our soldiers? Why volunteer to do it? What happens to them there? And what becomes of those soldiers when they return home?

Jean M. Gerber

in Vancouver

I asked those questions of a young man, Vancouver's Avi Barzelai, who recently returned from two tours in Afghanistan.

First, why did he enlist? "A personal decision," he explained. "I wanted to serve my country and do something different!"

Both tours had a very positive effect on his life today. Barzelai served the first term as a "grunt" with the infantry. The combat zone was rife with the threat of small-arms fire and more sinister and hidden daily encounters with IEDs, hidden explosives buried in roads, hidden in vehicles and strapped to the bodies of suicide bombers. All in all, it's a tense work environment, to say the least.

"Afghanistan is one big minefield," Barzelai says. "Leftovers from the Russians, the Taliban, just everybody. Also the enemy knows when we're coming."

On his second tour, Barzelai served as a helicopter door-gunner – that is, inside an open door behind a machine gun. It gave him a better view of the enemy and a whole different perspective on the conflict.

Helicopters escort other aircraft and can spot the enemy planting IEDs or planning ambushes. "We could look into the compounds where families live, see women doing the washing. You can't see that on the ground."

But the closest connections troops made with Afghans came on foot patrols. While the Canadians travelled with interpreters, it was "more about presence, assessing body language," Barzelai says.

"Afghans are very practical. They are watching to see who wins."

"Our best connections were with the kids," he says. "They are amazing, very resilient. It was no problem to establish connections. They liked the uniforms and the guns. They were hilarious, lots of fun, running in little wolf packs, boys and girls together, until the girls are 12 or 13 – then they cover up."

That's the why, where, how. But now soldiers are returning from Afghanistan. What happens next?

Barzelai has an answer.

"Returning soldiers are essentially on their own. Canada is completely unprepared for them. The skills they learned in the Forces are not recognized – for example, medics have training in trauma care, but have to start from scratch when they come home. For a combat soldier, the return is even harder."

They can't even readily qualify for security work.

In short, they often can't find a decent job, and there's little government help (unlike in the United States) in job retraining, education or skills recognition.

Post-traumatic stress "is a big problem," Barzelai says.

So he's started a construction company, Veteran's Contracting Canada, that will employ former soldiers.

"They've learned leadership, discipline and teamwork, and they'll show up, do a good job on a reno and work together. Returning soldiers have great potential to show positive results for Canada."

It's a soldiering family. Barzelai's brother has made aliyah to Israel and served in the Israel Defence Forces. Our community feels great pride and ownership in the IDF and those who serve in it, yet we're usually surprised when we hear of Jewish recruits in the Canadian Forces. Let's correct our attitudes and embrace both ways of service.

Talking with Barzelai, I realized that in both countries, the military isn't just about winning spectacular battles – which can be followed by a lot of disappointment – but in serving a country with pride. It's also about coming back to a country that values the service and wants to continue to support its soldiers. In Canada, we may have a long way to go in this regard. Here is one young man determined to make that happen.

We need to show how it's awesome

I hear the word "awesome" a lot these days, especially from my students. Yet I wonder if they truly mean it or use it in its full significance. What makes something full of awe for us? It can either be awe-full or awful, something worthy of wonderment or dread. Diametrically opposite meanings from the same word – it all depends on how we deploy it. Language is so expressive, yet often so misused.

I sound like an old fogey in this rant, yet it worries me this frequent overuse of awesome. I fear it signals the opposite of the plain meaning of the word. Rather than being awed, it betrays our inability to be impressed, or, more importantly, reverential. Overuse depreciates the events referred to. Calling everything awesome yields a world in which nothing is truly worthy of our amazement.

How can we educate a generation that watches so much TV and plays so many video games with sharp wizardry icons and impossibly glitzy technical interchanges to see the complex natural world around them, to be awed by it and to revel in its magnificence?

How can we show students the incredibly multifaceted story of history and expect them to get excited by revealing their own origins within these narratives?

How can we delve into social and cultural diversities and expose them to the wonder of human growth and their own potential?

These are the awesome wonders of life. But they find us all so boring. Students, children and even adults are too easily and often bored. They do not see the awe-inspiring events that surround us.

Life is often challenging, but is it boring? It shouldn't be. We shouldn't allow our children to think that way. That word should be banned.

In the group of prayers called Hallel, there is a section that speaks in part to these concerns. It frames the perspective of the awesome. "This is from God; it is wondrous in our eyes. This is the day God has made. Let us rejoice and be glad in it." For the believer, the notion that the wondrous comes from the Divine Power enhances one's sense of appreciation and endows the moment with greater gratitude, creating a need to celebrate, to express joy. In other words, a full sense of astonishment will involve joy. So if we develop appropriate use of the word awesome, if we frame it within contexts of applied great phenomenon, then there will emerge a sense of delight rather than this ennui that pervades our culture.

We are now in that time span between Purim and Passover, when Jewish history is full of remembrance and celebration. Challenging us to remember and forget, it's anything but boring. Confusing maybe, overloaded for sure. Stimulating and perplexing, there's so much here that we're tempted to just let it go. But we do that at our own risk. There is a treasure trove of Jewish awesome data. The difficult part is to look it up and learn about it.

Norma Baumel Joseph

in Montreal

Yet how do we retell the story over and over again without being boring? How do we repeat the rituals again and again without tedium? That challenge is ours. The very nature of ritual is in the repetition of an act, and through that recurrence, we allow something new to occur. The familiar isn't boring. It's in this repetitious moment that we're able to delve deeper into new meanings and find the truly awesome. Each telling unmasks new interpretations and applications.

But we need to study and prepare in order to be able to reveal and demonstrate the inspiring messages. Adults can't avoid their role in this chapter of our history. In order to meet the demands of awesomeness, we all, parents and teachers, must investigate the potential of our heritage. There are wondrous things in this world. It's up to us to constantly walk on that that path, renewing the narrative of awe to its most challenging pillar. At that point, we'll be using our words carefully and correctly, remembering, celebrating and being inspired by and awed by the wondrous.

This world we live in is easily spoiled. With difficulty, it can be protected and enhanced. By our efforts, it can be made more awesome!

Civil war in Syria reaches a stalemate

When the historic Arab Spring revolts erupted in December 2010, Syria seemed immune to the internal rebellions rocking and destabilizing the Arab world.

As uprisings protesting the status quo toppled authoritarian regimes in Tunisia, Egypt and Libya and sent tremors through such countries as Yemen, Jordan and Bahrain, Syria appeared safely removed from the escalating turmoil.

Syrian President Bashar Assad was brashly confident he could weather the storm, telling an American journalist in a Wall Street Journal interview in January 2011 that the conditions that gave rise to the unrest – despotism, corruption and economic stagnation – were not present in Syrian society.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Famous last words.

By March of 2011, a swelling tide of revolutionary fervour had swept into Syria, washing away self-deluding assumptions that long-suffering Syrians, weary of the heavy hand of dictatorship, were not psychologically prepared to challenge the legitimacy of Syria's deeply entrenched Baathist regime.

Two years on, borne along by a surge of dissatisfaction and anger with a government haughtily intolerant of dissent and barely responsive to the call for reform, the people of Syria have spoken in unison and risen up in mass revolt.

The uprising began peacefully enough, with Syrians demanding changes that, if sincerely implemented, might have transformed Syria into something of a functioning democracy.

In demonstrations that unfolded initially in towns and cities outside the capital, Damascus, Syrians urged Assad to enact measures to eliminate appalling abuses of power, promote human rights, uproot an endemic culture of cronyism and provide jobs for a growing army of unemployed and underemployed youth.

Assad, a member of the Alawite minority, responded ambivalently.

Backed by the army, security services, the Sunni merchant class and Christians, the pillars of his support system, he introduced cosmetic reforms. He replaced cabinet ministers, tweaked the repressive one-party state he had inherited from his father, Hafez, who died in 2000, and promised to unveil a new constitution.

But in what proved to be an egregious error, he ordered the police force to fire on protesters, killing scores of them in ugly confrontations that revealed the true face of the regime and now exposes it to charges of war crimes.

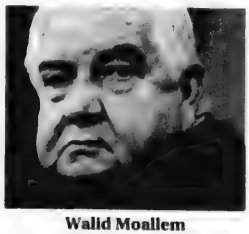
With the casualties piling up, Assad and his advisers confidently assumed that a strong show of firepower would act as a deterrent and defuse the demonstrations.

But on the second anniversary of the Syrian revolt, Assad's strategy has been a resounding failure. Fighting has greatly intensified and Syria has been plunged headlong into a destructive civil war.

By last week, more than 70,000 Syrians had been killed, two million had been internally displaced and 800,000 had fled into neighbouring countries, particularly Jordan, Lebanon and Turkey, creating a catastrophic refugee crisis.

The increasingly sectarian struggle, which already has affected adjacent nations in material ways, pits a desperate regime intent on survival against a politically diverse and fragmented alliance embodied in the National Coalition of Syrian Revolutionary and Opposition Forces, which was formed several months ago at the urging of pro-rebel western powers like the United States, Britain, Germany and France.

Bashar Assad



Walid Moallem

In an attempt to crush the uprising, which has spread into major cities such as Aleppo, Homs, Hama and Damascus, Assad has deployed heavy military equipment from tanks and artillery to missiles and airpower.

As he clings to office, denouncing his opponents as terrorists and foreign agents, Assad acts as if the Syrian people are the enemy to be vanquished.

The rebels, supported by regional countries ranging from Turkey and Qatar to Saudi Arabia and Egypt, have made impressive gains.

They have bombed Baathist citadels, assassinated important government figures and even lobbed mortars at Assad's presidential palace. They have also captured urban neighbourhoods, swaths of rural territory, border posts, military bases, dams and the site of Syria's nuclear reactor, obliterated by Israel in an air raid in September 2007.

Backed by Russia, China, Iran and Hezbollah, Assad has ferociously fought back with all the means at his disposal, even as some key loyalists have defected in an embarrassing blaze of publicity.

Defectors include the former prime minister, Riad Hijab, who has compared Assad to Nazis, and Manaf Tlass, a brigadier-general and adviser whose father, Mustafa, was defence minister for 30 years.

The fighting has left many towns in ruins and ground into a bitter stalemate. No less a person than Syria's vice-president, Farouk al-Sharaa, has acknowledged the impasse, having admitted that the army cannot defeat the rebels.

By the same token, the rebels will not be able to overthrow the regime unless they receive military assistance from western powers.

A procession of Arab League and United Nations mediators have tried in vain to stop the bloodshed.

The most ambitious effort was mounted in 2012 by Kofi Annan, the UN's former secretary-general, who presented a six-point plan under which hostilities would immediately cease within the framework of a ceasefire.

Assad accepted the truce, as did the rebels, but it collapsed in a welter of bad faith and recriminations, prompting Annan to resign and pin the blame on both the regime and the rebels.

Annan's successor, Lakhdar Brahimi, the former minister of Algeria, has been sidelined into irrelevance, too. Having declared that Assad must relinquish power and cannot be part of a solution, Brahimi has been denounced by the regime as being "flagrantly biased."

Two months ago, after saying he would never leave Syria, Assad categorically rejected the idea of negotiating with the rebels. But last week, for the first time, Syrian Foreign Minister Walid Moallem said his government is ready to conduct talks with the armed opposition. The rebels are apparently willing to join the discussions, but only if Assad is not a party to a final settlement.

In the meantime, with the fighting raging on, Brahimi has warned that Syria is being destroyed "bit by bit."

If the violence does not subside, Syria, as France's foreign minister recently suggested, could fall to militant Islamic groups, thereby creating an immense problem for neighbours such as Israel, Lebanon and Jordan.

Should the civil war continue for considerably much longer, Syria could well disintegrate into warring sectarian fiefdoms, with incalculable consequences for every country in the Middle East.

Rabbis to pay tribute to David Hartman

A taste of late scholar's teachings on March 11

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Eight Toronto rabbis will offer a taste of what they learned from Rabbi David Hartman at a March 11 event at Beth Tzedec Congregation to commemorate Rabbi Hartman's shloshim.

The founder of the Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem, Rabbi Hartman died Feb. 10 after a long illness. He was 81.

A native of Brooklyn, N.Y., Rabbi Hartman led Montreal's Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem from 1960 until he made aliyah in 1971. In addition to his work at the institute, which he named in memory of his father, Rabbi Hartman was a professor of Jewish thought at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem for more than 20 years.

In a sermon following Rabbi Hartman's death, Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, organizer of the evening and Beth Tzedec's senior rabbi, spoke of Rabbi Hartman's "personal passion and intellectual vigour."

He also said that, in recent years, Rabbi Hartman – who was ordained at Yeshiva University, which is modern Orthodox – became "more pointed in his criticism of the exclusionary Orthodox and an articulate advocate for moderate religious innovation, particularly in relationship to women in Judaism… In seminars and lectures one could feel David's pain that his ideas had not gained a sufficient foothold in Orthodoxy."

Rabbi Hartman was involved in "serious and sustained dialogue" with Diaspora Jewish leaders, Israeli politicians and army commanders seeking ethical guidance, as well as high school students, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl added in his sermon.

Rabbi Hartman's former students who are taking part in the event at Beth Tzedec include rabbis Frydman-Kohl, Martin Berman, Edward Elkin, Elyse Goldstein, Howard Morrison, John Moscowitz, Yossi Sapirman, and Shalom Schachter.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl told The CJN that all the presenters either studied at the Hartman Institute or had a longstanding relationship with Rabbi Hartman. Their presentations will be limited to between 4 and 5 minutes each.

The event, which starts at 8 p.m., is called Rabbi David Hartman: Torah in Tribute and Memory. Topics include "Can Halachah be immoral?" (Rabbi Berman), "Pushing the Halachic envelope for women" (Rabbi Goldstein), and "Klal Yisrael: Religious pluralism and conversion" (Rabbi Morrison).

Rabbi David Hartman

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said the evening will reflect "the many different facets" of Rabbi Hartman's thoughts, and offer insight into a scholar who "had such an influence on Jewish life in the Diaspora and Israel."

The Face of the Ghetto: Pictures by Jewish Photographers from the Lodz Ghetto, 1940 — 1944

February 24-March 17, 2013

The Law Library, Osgoode Hall Law School of York University
Hours: Monday—Thursday 8am-10pm
Friday 8am-5pm
Saturday—Sunday 10am-6pm

Although the Nazis forbade Jews in the Lodz Ghetto to possess cameras, a few Jewish photographers were commissioned to document the efficiency of Ghetto labour. At their own initiative and at personal risk, they took thousands of photographs that reflect the efforts of ghetto inhabitants to maintain their dignity and culture in unspeakably harsh circumstances.

Assembled by the Topography of Terror Foundation in Berlin and mounted at the United Nations in New York, the exhibition will be complemented by a series of lectures, films and panels.

Judaica store celebrates 25 years

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

On the 25th anniversary of his business, the owner of Aleph Bet Judaica says he feels like he doesn't work.

Originally from Israel, Moshe Joseph, a husband and father of three, moved from Montreal after buying the store in 1987.

"I've come to the store every day since, but I'm not working, I'm enjoying every minute," he said.

Joseph, 57, met his wife, who is from Montreal, while she was on an ulpan in Israel. He worked at Rodals Judaica in Montreal, and when the opportunity arose to buy this store, located on Bathurst Street south of Wilson Avenue and formerly known as Zucker's, the family moved.

"The 25 years have flown by. I love the customers, the products and the atmosphere," he said.

His day starts early. "I come to the store, eat breakfast, look at the news in Israel, call my parents in Israel [his father works in the store when he visits] and then open up. It is a routine I don't change."

There's no secret to the success of his business, he said. "We're friendly here, so people like coming in. There is always Israeli music playing, there is a lot of choice in books and Judaica, and the prices are good."

A member of the Iraqi Jewish Association, which holds services in the Sephardic Kehila Centre, Joseph said he carries books for every denomination.

If a customer is looking for a product that's not in the store, he's happy to order it, he said.

Looking back on his 25 years in business, Joseph said Judaica stores are not what they used to be.

"These stores used to be the only place to buy Judaica and Jewish books. Now, [the items] are available online or even in supermarkets," he said.

"When customers come in here, though, they get the personal touch. They can ask questions, get advice, and shop in an Israeli atmosphere. It's a different feeling.

"Mine is a life-cycle store. Many customers have grown up with me. They've bought wedding, bar mitzvah, housewarming and baby presents, and these are items that are rooted in Judaism."

Volunteer nominated for international award

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

Daniel Freiman's love of sports and social media has contributed to the 26-year-old's nomination, along with nine other international volunteers, for an International Volunteer of the Year Award.

Daniel Freiman volunteered as a physical education teacher in a Kenyan school.

The selection committee chose the 10 candidates from 20,758 volunteers from around the world.

Freiman received the nomination from the International Volunteer Head Quarters (IVHQ) for his volunteer work as a physical education teacher in a school in Kenya, where his students were orphans and children from the slums of Nairobi.

He said sports are the gateway to opportunities. "Without sports, I would be a different person. You learn perseverance and teamwork," he added. "It is especially important for kids who don't have parents in their background, to learn the skills of life."

To create enthusiasm for sports at the Kenyan school, Freiman made a sports video of the children re-enacting Game 6 of the 1986 World Series, with the original voice of the sportscaster.

He originally intended just to give the children a CD of the video, and he planned to send the video to his family and a few friends.

But "it went viral on YouTube," he said. "In a short time, thousands of viewers around the world had viewed the video."

He then decided to capitalize on the video's overwhelming success. "I decided to raise funds for the Grace Care Centre [home to more than 200 orphans] in Kenya," he said, "as I knew [that having] a sports field would make a difference for the 215 or more disadvantaged students who go to the school."

Recently, Freiman, with the help of his brother, David, created a second re-enactment video – one of a basketball game featuring Larry Bird's famous game-winning steal from the 1987 NBA playoffs.

The videos are on the Deadspin, Grantland, the Huffington Post and the Toronto Star websites, and they have been picked up by ESPN.

He said that in order to complete the playing field in Kenya, he has partnered with a Canadian organization, Lift the Children.

To date, they have raised $24,000. They require $56,000 to purchase the field and cover construction costs.

Freiman attended Bialik Hebrew Day School and the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, and he received his undergraduate degree, in business, at the University of Western Ontario. He's working toward an MBA at the Ted Rogers School of Management at Ryerson University in Toronto.

He said that for generations his family has been supporters of Jewish and Israeli causes.

"I love Israel and have been there many times," he said. "I chose Kenya because I wanted to have a different experience. Recently, I was volunteering in Costa Rica."

Freiman said that the baseball and basketball videos have been viewed more than 400,000 times in over 60 countries.

To watch the videos, visit YouTube and search for "1986 World Series Game 6… in Kenya" and "1987 NBA Playoff… in Kenya."

Voting for the Volunteer of the Year is open until March 15. To vote, visit www.volunteerhq.org.

Navigating the causes of divorce

Family Matters
by John Syrtash
B. A. (Hon), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator
for 31 years

The day is not so young yet but, we,

Brief sparkles in His eye,

So ignore the Wonder from whence we came

And the Dust to where we'll Wander,

Oh dear Raven, where have you gone?

Go find My Children among the cell phone chips

Tell them: We left you in the Flood.

What causes divorce? People ask me this all the time. After 31 years of practising family law, you think I might have some idea. Oh, there are many wise people who think they know, especially those who have gone through it or know someone who has.

Both women and men can go astray and many cannot forgive. Spouses change and grow apart. Many become mentally or physically ill and certain partners cannot deal with such changes easily. Empty nesters who separate often well into their retirement years are becoming increasingly numerous, especially when the only tie that kept the bond together was the kids. Even newlyweds suddenly discover an undisclosed illness or addiction, and poof, it's over.

We didn't always live in an age of disposable marriages. Divorce used to be an embarrassment: it was understood that couples "worked things out" for the good of their children or the family's honour, if for no other reason. Now children often grow up with parents who practise serial monogamy, with a new partner every few years or even a few months. For those of under 40, it may be hard to believe that there used to be more of a moral stigma about divorce that just doesn't quite sting as much anymore.

Now that relationships are as disposable as socks, what's the big deal? How many people do you know who darn their socks anymore? Most simply say, "Just move on and get a life."

Aside from religious inhibitions, part of that stigma was that one or the other spouse simply didn't try hard enough to make the relationship work. (I'm not referring here to clearly abusive relationships.) Society used to frown on breakups. Now we've become so accustomed to them that after a few whispers and temporary shock, the gossip ends after a few minutes, no matter who did what to whom (or didn't) and why.

This change of attitude is reflected in the change in Canada's divorce laws a few decades ago. Most people don't realize that when spouses separate and go before a Family Law judge, the law of Canada that he or she applies has become morally blind. It's normally indifferent to the causes or reasons a marriage runs into trouble.

Law of Canada indifferent to causes of divorce

The exceptions often have to do with how a parent relates towards his or her child, especially when both spouses are fighting over custody and access. As well, if a spouse is intentionally acting improperly with his or her funds to deprive the other of a fair share of the assets or income, the court may then intervene with "restorative" orders such as freezing assets, reapportioning their values in favour of the injured spouse, or even redirecting someone's pay cheque or other sources of income.

Moreover, all that a proven allegation of adultery gains an injured spouse is a much shorter waiting period to obtain a divorce order, but nothing else — no greater rights to property, children or support. So if a spouse wants a moral anchor, don' t look so much for it in Canada's Family Laws. Look elsewhere. Think about darning those socks.

Iran is further ahead on nuclear bomb

The question about Iran's nuclear weapons program, which Iran denies it's pursuing, remains urgent despite an undeniable tedium to the seemingly endless and repetitive discussions in the media about what can be done to stop it.

Attention was refocused on this subject recently when talks between Iran and the "P5+1" – the five permanent UN Security Council members: the United States, France, Britain, Russia and China, plus Germany – ended after two days in Almaty, Kazakhstan, on Feb. 27.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Iran came away from the negotiations pleased that the P5+1 members softened their previous demands, requiring that Iran only suspend, not shut down, operations at its deeply buried Fordo nuclear fuel enrichment site. In addition, Iran would be allowed to keep some stockpiles of 20 per cent enriched uranium – enough, that is, to be used to produce "medical isotopes."

Iran's Shahab-3 missile

Apparently, the idea behind the P5+1 concessions is to give Iran some face-saving measures that will allow it to compromise in turn, though no deadline was set, only a schedule for further talks over the next two months.

It would be a mild understatement to say that Israel remains skeptical about Iran's willingness to compromise in any meaningful way. Israel is convinced that Iran is simply stalling as it races ahead to develop capacity to build nuclear weapons. Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said "there are no measures that will make Iran heed the demands of the international community aside from military sanctions against it."

Even that might be insufficient.

Netanyahu's skepticism is well founded. While Kazakhstan talks were underway, Britain's Telegraph disclosed "details of activity at a heavily guarded Iranian facility [at Arak] from which international inspectors have been barred for 18 months. [Satellite] images, taken earlier this month, show that Iran has activated the Arak heavy-water production plant." Heavy water is needed to operate a nuclear reactor that can produce enough plutonium for a bomb.

Having two options for making a bomb (uranium and plutonium) is critical, as Mitch Ginsburg explained in a fascinating story last summer in the Times of Israel. Ginsburg interviewed Uzi Even, a founder of Israel's nuclear reactor in Dimona. Currently a chemistry professor at Tel Aviv University, Even "has a history of being correct about foreign countries' nuclear capacities" according to Ginsburg.

Although a political dove, Even has no doubt whatsoever about Iran's determination to acquire a nuclear arsenal. He does not, however, favour an Israeli attack on Iran's facilities at this time. Still, his assessment of what Iran has already achieved is sobering. As Ginsburg reported: "Even believes that [Iran] has already, covertly, created the 20 to 25 kilograms of highly enriched uranium necessary to conduct a successful underground test. In other words, he believes Iran is already a nuclear power."

Even explained that moving from 20 per cent enriched nuclear to weapons-grade fuel "can be done underground [as at Fordo], in something the size of a storage room, and no one would know." This is what Iran has already accomplished, Even believes.

Nonetheless, it's one thing to have sufficient enriched fuel for a nuclear test and quite another to be able to deploy it as a weapon. That could take several more years.

The problem is one of weight. Ginsburg summarized Even thus: "A uranium warhead is at least five times heavier than a plutonium one. Creating a nuclear warhead and winnowing down the complex infrastructure necessary to detonate it effectively — to, say, the one-ton maximum payload of Iran's best ballistic missile, the Shahab-3" is currently beyond Iran's capability.

It's because of this problem that Iran is pursuing the plutonium option. Even explained that producing the plutonium needed for a single bomb would take one year from the time the plutonium-based reactor (in Arak) was operational. Last year, the IAEA knew that Iran planned to begin operating a plutonium-based reactor at Arak in the third quarter of 2013.

But if the information disclosed by the Telegraph is accurate, Iran has greatly accelerated its timetable.

While this should send alarm signals to the West, it appears that the West instead is playing into Iran's hands.

An important development, says CIJA

Supreme Court: 'Not all truthful statements must be free from restriction'

The Supreme Court "narrowed the definition of actionable speech," said CIJA CEO Shimon Fogel.

"They confirmed that there's speech that leads to vilification and hatred of particular groups, which have to be protected, but they narrowed the definition of what constitutes that speech," Fogel said.

"I think it's an important development. We support the proposition that there are limits to free speech and there is a connection between physical harm directed against a particular community and language used to vilify them," he said.

A very different perspective was offered by Sun News broadcaster Ezra Levant.

"The Supreme Court of Canada has weakened freedom of religion and freedom of speech in favour of the counterfeit human right not to be offended," Levant told The CJN.

"This Supreme Court case is a dangerous step backwards for personal freedom, and it opens the door wider to the political abuse of Canada's erratic human rights commissions. The fact that three of the six judges in the case were Jewish is an extra disappointment for the Jewish and pro-Israel community that has recently been victimized by these censorship laws," Levant said.

"This ruling is like a starter pistol for a dozen more nuisance suits attacking writers like Mark Steyn and me for criticizing radical Islam – a view that could have pro-Israel activists hauled before courts for the crime of 'hate.'"

Levant, former publisher of the defunct Western Standard magazine, was brought before the Alberta Human Rights Commission in 2008 after he published pictures of the Islamic prophet Mohammed. He has been a fierce critic of human rights commissions and the legislation that establishes them.

Referring to the Whatcott case, he said, "This ruling is especially frightening, given that it confirms that traditional legal defences – like truth, fair comment, religious belief and public interest – do not apply to hate speech cases."

In the judgment, the Supreme Court addressed the argument that speech was being restricted, even though no actual harm or discrimination was demonstrable. "Such an approach ignores the particularly insidious nature of hate speech," the court ruled. "The end goal of hate speech is to shift the environment from one where harm against vulnerable groups is not tolerated to one where hate speech has created a place where this is either accepted or a blind eye is turned."

"A court is entitled to use common sense and experience in recognizing that certain activities, hate speech among them, inflict societal harms."

And in rejecting the defence of truthful expression, the court stated, "Not all truthful statements must be free from restriction. Truthful statements can be interlaced with harmful ones or otherwise presented in a manner that would meet the definition of hate speech."

Editorialists at Canada's influential newspapers were critical of the decision, with the National Post calling it "censorship by any other name." The Toronto Star stated that society should impose the fewest restrictions on free speech and that only courts, and not human rights tribunals, should sanction speech issues.

The Globe and Mail said the court had set dangerously vague standards by which to regulate speech and "the marketplace of ideas, not human-rights commissions, should be where bad ideas, even hateful ones (short of those advocating or inciting violence), are beaten back."

Despite supporting the decision, CIJA continued to call for changes to provincial human rights legislation. They should be amended to permit the awarding of costs to successful parties, to deter frivolous actions; the punitive aspect of the legislation should be removed and its educational aspect stressed; evidentiary rules need to change, and provincial attorneys general should consult and create a consistent approach to human rights in Canada, Fogel said.

Holy mascara!

Rabbi David Rosenthal

Some things just don't seem to go together. Cream cheese and peanut butter; ice cream and codfish; bananas and tomato sauce. So in this week's parashah, I was a little taken aback when I read about the materials used to build the Holy Tabernacle.

When I think "cosmetics," I don't usually think "great gift for a shul."

Yet this is the image that greets us in the parashah this week. The women of the Jewish nation gathered together and donated their makeup mirrors for the construction of the Tabernacle. At first, Moses was reluctant to accept such seemingly mundane, and even materialistic, items. How could such objects of desire be used for such a holy enterprise?

Yet HaShem reprimanded Moses. "These are holy mirrors."

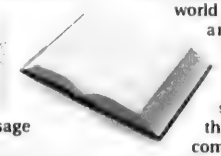
Why were they holy, you may ask?

At the time of the Egyptian enslavement of the Jewish people, one of the key strategies employed by the Egyptian task masters was to work the men so strenuously that at the end of the day, when they came home to their wives, the men would simply not have the energy or desire for procreation, leaving the Jewish people with no future offspring.

Seeing what was going on, the Jewish women gathered together to combat the situation. They proceeded to put on makeup and the like in order to pique the interest of their husbands. It was due to their efforts that at the end of their time in Egypt, the Jewish People still had significant numbers to their population.

Aside from taking a makeup course, what's the message for us today?

Rabbinic Reflections



At first glance, there seems to be things that are inherently good and things that are inherently bad. A Torah scroll is good. Marijuana is bad.

However, upon reflection, one realizes that the value of an object is determined solely by how we use it. In Judaism, unlike other religions, there is no such thing as categorically good or evil. Everything has the ability to either be uplifted or debased. Food can be used for the service of HaShem, or it can be used for the degradation of our lesser halves. Money can be used to help the needy or to gamble on a horse race. In fact, the greater the potential for corruption, the greater the ability for growth. That is why Judaism views the bedroom as the Holy of Holies, the area with the highest possible potential, for it there lies the greatest room for deprivation and misdirection.

Our mission as Jews is to take the world and all its components and use them in the highest possible way by directing them in meaningful pursuits. There's no such thing as neutral when it comes to this world. Either something is being used as a means to grow and better ourselves and the world, or it's not.

To bring it down to a more practical level, start paying attention to your own motivations. Ask yourself why you do what you do. The Jewish women in Egypt put on makeup in order to build the Jewish nation. What's our agenda? Where are we headed?

Rabbi David Rosenthal is director of outreach and development for Thornhill Woods Shul in Thornhill, Ont.

Investing in our children

Once again, the issue of day school tuition is in the news. Leo Baeck Day School in Toronto has announced plans for grants of up to $5,000 per child who commit to at least three years at Leo Baeck. Most appropriately, they have defined a middle class income for parents with three children at $350,000, which recognizes the fact that one must be very rich to afford a Jewish day school education.

When one considers that Statistics Canada recently announced that at $201,000, one joins the top one per cent of earners, we begin to realize the scope of the challenge we face if we want to be able to provide affordable day school education. So while the $5,000 is nice – and the anonymous donor who is funding this grant for Leo Baeck has set a wonderful example for others to emulate – considering that a Jewish education from preschool to Grade 12 costs more than $225,000 a child (in Toronto – it may be lower elsewhere), it's really a drop in the bucket.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

I'd like to float another idea in the hope that others will take up the challenge to literally shape the future, in a most positive way, of the Jewish community. Imagine that as a "reward" for sending a child through Grade 8 to a Jewish day school, the community would give that child a free high school education. The advantages of such an approach include the facts that the biggest drop in day school enrolment occurs between grades 8 and 9, high school costs about 60 per cent more than elementary school, and research shows that the impact of four years of Jewish education during the adolescent years is much greater than even the 10 pre-high school years.

Funding such an initiative would cost approximately $40 million a year in Toronto. That sounds like a lot, but it's a fraction of the money raised for charity in the Jewish community in the city every year. Between federation support and fundraising initiatives already being undertaken by the schools, about $35 million is being raised annually. Doubling the amount raised would take some work, but with effort and some vision, it's definitely doable.

I call on those who either personally or through charitable foundations have net assets in excess of $25 million (and there are many more of these people than most of us realize) to allocate five per cent of their capital as a one-time investment in our children.

Parents would be asked to help by purchasing $750,000 in life insurance, the proceeds of which would fund the Jewish education of the grandchildren of today's students. With a high school education costing $100,000 or so, and life insurance premiums for a couple in their 40s costing approximately $70,000, with even only one child in high school, a family would save $30,000. Each additional child would bring about a full $100,000 in savings, so that a family with four children would save $330,000. While substantial, this should be the first step in a plan to eventually give Jewish children (and parents) what children around the world are entitled to: a free education.

Essays reflect values central to Rabbi Sacks' teaching

Views & Reviews

Martin Lockshin

It is a pleasure to note the publication in January of Radical Responsibility: Celebrating the Thought of Chief Rabbi Lord Jonathan Sacks, edited by Michael J. Harris, Daniel Rynhold and Tamra Wright. The book consists of an introduction and afterword by the editors, and 13 impressive essays written by intellectuals, most of them modern Orthodox Jews. Every essay is worth reading, and I apologize in advance for the fact that I will not be able to mention all of them in this short review.

The book honours Rabbi Sacks who is celebrating his 65th birthday this week and will soon complete his term as chief rabbi of the United Hebrew Congregations of the Commonwealth. He has discharged his duties as chief rabbi admirably, teaching a version of Orthodox Judaism that engages with modernity in a meaningful manner.

On a recent trip to Canada, Rabbi Sacks attracted large crowds who found his words eloquent and uplifting. His appearance here with the great Canadian public intellectual Prof. Charles Taylor, retired from McGill University, showed his commitment to pluralism, even to the point of engaging with sincere Christian intellectuals. Both Taylor and another Catholic thinker, Alasdair MacIntyre, have contributed essays to this volume.

This new book honours Rabbi Sacks by reflecting many of the values that have been central to his teaching, and it does not shy away from honestly addressing some of the thornier tensions between western and Jewish values.

Prof. Michael Broyde's contribution raises the morally troubling distinction that Halachah (traditional Jewish law) makes between returning a lost item to a Jew or to a gentile, offering moral arguments for the distinction.

Prof. Joshua Berman addresses one of the more disturbing chapters of the Bible, Joshua Chapter 7, the story of Achan. Berman's essay begins by quoting a British Bible critic who wrote: "The story [of Achan] projects a portrait of a deity who is cruel, petty and vengeful... It is difficult to find within the story of Achan's sin any residual merit or moral lesson... [it exhibits] painful savagery." Berman's close reading of the chapter rises to the moral challenge, showing that the chapter promotes values with which modern people can identify.

A number of the essays in the book deal with human autonomy. Prof. Jacob J. Schachter's essay sets up the issue: we in the West live in a world that values human autonomy above almost every other value. We like to feel that the choices that we make on moral issues are "autonomous," i.e., that they come from within us. On the other hand, Halachah is often described as being based on "heteronomy," the belief that the way that I behave ought to be based on obedience to a source outside of me, specifically God who is commanding me to behave as He legislates, not the way that I feel to be correct. Schachter argues that the oft-discussed problem is really a false dichotomy as Halachah leaves room for and encourages autonomy in many ways.

Prof. David Shatz addresses the issue of the appropriate motivation for moral actions from a different angle. He builds his essay around a question posed by Plato in The Republic about whether people who behave in what appears to be an altruistic manner are really motivated by a desire to help someone else or by the desire to make themselves look magnanimous. Shatz then shifts the argument about altruism to the field of Jewish thought: does Judaism have room for the idea of altruism when the concept of mitzvah, of doing something because God commanded it, is at Halachah's centre?

Two thoughtful but very different essays address the issue of tolerance and pluralism in religious thought. Both of them try to make sense of a line from the revised second edition of Rabbi Sack's controversial book, The Dignity of Difference: "Those who are confident in their faith are not threatened but enlarged by the different faith of others."

Prof. Menachem Kellner shows that, broadly speaking, classical Judaism had two schools of thought about the place of Jews and gentiles in the world. One school of thought, led by such thinkers as Judah Halevi (c. 1075-1141) and then further developed by Jewish mystics, saw Jews as being intrinsically superior to all other human beings and as being the ultimate purpose of God's plan on Earth. He contrasts Halevi's position with that of Moses Maimonides (1138-1204) who saw no intrinsic difference between Jews and non-Jews and who even saw Christianity and Islam as serving some positive purpose in the world (uncensored version of Maimonides' Mishneh Torah, Melachim 11:4). Kellner admits that he goes beyond Maimonides' position in his own approach to pluralism. He points out that today science has advanced our comprehension of the world. We know that it consists of billions of people, of whom only a tiny number are Jews, and many of the gentiles "are no less moral and no less sophisticated than we are."

Accordingly, it becomes harder for Kellner to take seriously the claims of the Jewish camp led by Halevi that argued that "all that exists was created only so that God could reveal the Torah to Moses, in order that the Jewish People could live according to it in a small patch of real estate on the eastern shore of the Mediterranean Sea."

Taylor explains what it means to have a positive attitude to the religious traditions of other faiths. He says that he learned from Rabbi Sacks that "one doesn't unite the different faiths by flattening out their doctrinal story into some core elements... This is what Jonathan Sacks has been telling us all along. This can come as news to us Christians, but as he argues, it doesn't to Jews."

Readers who want to see the best of modern Orthodox thought or who admire Rabbi Sacks and his kindred spirits will find Radical Responsibility a worthwhile and pleasurable read.

Dying with dignity is not giving up

'If the journey goes well, I feel like I've made a difference'

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

The popular image of a doctor is of a healer who helps patients recover from whatever ails them.

That's also what they likely imagine for themselves when they enter medical school and later when deciding on the type of medicine they want to practice.

Yet even patients who have no chance of recovery need a physician to help them live out their lives with dignity.

Dr. Daphna Grossman

Often, doctors who work in palliative care began their careers with other plans, but can recall an incident or patient that inspired them to work in the field.

Dr. Daphna Grossman, a palliative care physician at Baycrest, remembers the exact moment she decided on her specialty.

"I was doing a fellowship in emergency medicine, and a man with metastatic lung cancer came in with cardiac arrest. While the [doctors] were pumping his chest, I thought to myself, 'This man should not be dying like this. He should be dying with dignity.' It was a light-bulb moment."

She said that if people truly understand their loved one's illness, they would be able to make a more informed decision about treatment.

"When people who are extraordinarily ill [come to emergency], should we aggressively try to bring them back, or should we let them live their life as best as possible and die [comfortably?]"

Grossman said that dying with dignity is not giving up.

"It is dying of a chronic illness. What do you want it to look like? Do you want [the patient] to die with tubes in a hospital bed, or be surrounded by family in comfortable surroundings?"

She said that patients in palliative care do receive antibiotics, if necessary, and drugs such as morphine might be used so they can breathe more easily. "We shift to comfort care. We deal with the symptoms, because we know we can't deal with the underlying condition. The trick is to understand when someone is dying, so when they die, they die comfortably."

Palliative Care

Second of a 3-part series

Most people tend to think of palliative care as end-of-life-care, she said, "but really, good care can be given at any point of an illness. End-of-life-care is end-of life care, but palliative care is more holistic. It is about symptom control at any point of an illness, and it can be in conjunction with acute care."

Dr. Adam Rapoport

Palliative care involves a multi-disciplinary approach, which includes a number of professionals, Grossman said.

"There are physicians, a geriatric psychiatrist, clergy – a rabbi or priest to make sure spiritual needs are met – a physiotherapist, a dietician, a swallow expert to teach the patient to swallow properly, and a recreationist."

Dr. Adam Rapoport, medical director of the pediatric advanced care team at the Hospital for Sick Children, is also a palliative care consultant at the Temmy Latner Centre for Palliative Care at Mount Sinai Hospital.

"I often ask myself how I stumbled into this field. [But] along the line, I have dealt with many children from birth to age 18 who have conditions that we could not cure," Rapoport said.

"Children with medical complexities are a growing population, and many who would have died 20 years ago are kept alive today through drugs, surgery and technology. Although they stay alive, though, their problems are not fixed. They are living longer with challenging symptoms."

Dr. Russell Goldman

When he first became exposed to these children, he said, "I realized that we had to give them as good a life as possible. I knew that we needed to add life to a child's time, not time to a child's life. They should not just be alive biologically, they should be enjoying their lives. That's what we try to bring to these children and their families," said Rapoport.

As opposed to end-of-life-care, he said, pediatric palliative care strives for early intervention. "We work with families and try to help them [address] symptoms and control pain. Few parents embrace the idea of end-of-life care. They fight the disease and make sure every day is as good as possible."

By integrating the philosophy of early intervention, he said, "we improve the lives of children and their families. As things begin to change, we can take more of a front seat."

When his medical team is involved early on, Rapoport said, families become familiar with the doctors and are able to trust them. "When things do begin to change, we do not have to begin a new relationship during that very difficult time."

Pediatric palliative care is much more about living than dying, he said. "It is all about how the family wants their children to live their lives."

He admitted that many of his colleagues find it difficult to work in his field. "They are in the business of saving lives, and they don't know how to help [these families]," he said.

"I realized that we have an obligation to be there, even if we can't make things better, so I dove in and got a master's of bioethics at University of Toronto. I started working at Temmy Latner, and then went to Sick Kids in 2011."

This work is clearly not for everyone, he said, "but for me it is extremely rewarding. There may be a sad outcome, but for me it is about the journey. If the journey goes well, then I feel like I've made a difference."

Community partners such as financial consultant Sonny Goldstein, have helped make his work easier, he said.

Goldstein, the founder and chair of Care for Kids (Toronto), raises money for palliative care programs.

"When I was president of Life Underwriters Association in 1991, we were looking to have a charitable giving arm, and one member told us that pediatric palliative care was in desperate need of money," he said.

"We had a campaign, eventually raised $25,000, and used it to send nurses on home visits. In 1993 we formed Care for Kids, and since then have raised about $500,000."

Dr. Russell Goldman, director of the Temmy Latner Centre, said that in 1992, when he was training in family medicine, he became interested in the court case of Sue Rodriguez, the British Columbia resident who had amotrophic lateral sclerosis (ALS, known as Lou Gehrig's disease) and petitioned the Supreme Court for the right to assisted suicide. She lost her case, but eventually was aided by an anonymous physician.

"This case got me thinking. It's not just about more time, it's about quality of life."

Sometimes the health-care team or the patients themselves are reluctant to discuss palliative care, he said. "We believe in communication. We're not here to dictate. We're here to help make decisions and to focus on comfort."

His centre, he said, provides in-hospital care and provides home care. Through the Max and Beatrice Wolfe Children's Centre, it also looks after children and their families.

"Our team provides home coverage for people with advanced progressive illnesses, and the team tries to keep the patients out of the [emergency room.] The physicians work with visiting nurses to monitor home care."

Goldman stresses that his work is not depressing. "I find it rewarding. I get the opportunity to meet people in the most intimate way. I also work with a great group of people."

Next week: Hospice workers and volunteers.

Olivia Varkul, with help from her friends, made security blankets as her bat mitzvah project.

Bat mitzvah creates security blanket for kids

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

Preparing for your bat mitzvah is always a busy time – but it was even busier for 12-year-old Olivia Varkul, who decided to make hers more meaningful by doing a mitzvah project to commemorate the occasion.

"At our school, we're always taught to give back," said Olivia, who is in Grade 7 at Toronto Heschel School. "I thought I could do something nice for other people and recognize I'm really lucky to be having a bat mitzvah, and it's nice for other people who are less fortunate than me."

Since she always used to carry around a security blanket as a child, she was excited when she heard about Project Linus, an organization that makes homemade security blankets and donates them to seriously ill children. Since its founding in 1998, the project has delivered more than four million blankets to sick kids.

"I carried [my blanket] around all the time when I was really little," said Olivia. But rather than just donating a blanket, she wanted to make them herself – and include her family and friends. Fabricland donated the fabric, and the Sewing Studio in Toronto donated sewing instruction time. Olivia, along with 13 friends and her brother, went to the studio to learn how to make blankets from a piece of fabric. She'll be using them as centrepieces for her bat mitzvah in March and donating them afterward.

To learn how her project would directly affect ill children, Olivia went to Scarborough Hospital to see how the blankets are used in the child nursery there. "I thought it was cool because I was actually able to go to the hospital and I saw the blankets on all the incubators on the premature babies and saw them being put into use," she said. "Some of [the premature babies] weren't with their parents, so it's nice for them to have a little bit of colour compared to just the white flannel blankets that they have."

Olivia's eagerness to help others and turn her bat mitzvah into something more than just a party has impressed her entire family, especially her mother.

"This wasn't something that she was waking up and saying let's take on the world. She was very open to finding a project and working on it, and through the course, I've seen a lot of maturity and growth in her," said Olivia's mother, Joanna Shapiro. "It's given her some really nice leadership skills and a nice sense of ownership, and has shown her how she can take on mitzvot going forward, not necessarily just giving money, but actually doing something."

Olivia's desire to give back doesn't end there. In lieu of gifts, she's asked her guests to make donations to a B'nai Tzedek fund, a program where teenagers create tzedakah funds in their name, and then donate that money to organizations they choose. And, despite giving up some gifts, Olivia said she's not worried about missing out on anything. "I don't need to be getting so many of these gifts. There are less fortunate people that need it more than I do," she said. "I'm not feeling short of anything."

That's the message that her mother said they try to send at home.

"The amount that kids get for their bat mitzvahs is so much that it's so easy to use it as an opportunity to give to others and still feel like you will get so much yourself," said Shapiro.

"It's hard to strike a balance when planning a bat mitzvah – to make sure we stay focused on the religious milestone, in the midst of all the busyness and excitement of event planning," said Shapiro. "Having this mitzvah project, and needing to work on all the steps to make it happen and be meaningful, really helped us as a family and Olivia to have a grounding through this process."

Israeli students aim to dispel myths about home

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

A group of Israeli students visited Canada last month, a week ahead of Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW), to try to spread the word that what people see in mainstream media doesn't necessarily represent Israel.

WordSwap was formed just three months ago, but the group of 17 volunteers have already embarked on their first outreach trip to spark dialogue about Israel by meeting with students of all backgrounds on Ontario university campuses and at McGill University in Montreal.

They arrived Feb. 21, and met with several groups on various campuses. At the University of Toronto, they held a session to educate listeners about diversity in Israel, with a discussion that featured five of the volunteers. They were all Israelis, but the mix included Jews, Druze and Bedouin.

"The only thing we agree on is that Israel has the right to exist. Other than that, we can argue about everything," said Nachi Brodt, a 24-year-old Montreal native who moved to Israel when he was seven years old. "If it wasn't for that 12-hour flight, I could easily be sitting... with the other side of the table."

Raya Azmi described life as a Druze Israeli-Arab as somewhat challenging. She said people sometimes challenge her, asking how she could feel comfortable living as an Arab in Israel, but she sees herself as proof of peace and democracy in a country where she is free to practise her religion and celebrate her culture.

Ruthie Berber said she joined the group to try to counter the hatred she experienced when she was 16. She had moved to Israel when she was 15, and the next year, she visited her native city of London, England. She introduced herself to a friend of a friend in London and said she lived in Israel, and he responded by spitting and calling her a dirty terrorist.

"I had no idea what was going on. I couldn't express how shocked I was," she said. "I saw something that terrified me: a hatred that I could not understand where it was coming from."

She said peace could be achieved through dialogue, which is why she opposes ideas like the Boycott, Divestment, and Sanctions movement, and IAW.

"We wanted people to be a little more open minded before they participate in an event that just promotes blind hatred, and maybe get to know a little more about Israel before they start proclaiming apartheid and genocide without real backing," she said.

The response has been good, she said, adding that it's given her the chance to introduce herself and her friends and tell their stories to people she probably wouldn't otherwise meet.

Brian Lee, a student who attended the discussion, said it gave him an opportunity to learn about a country he knew little about.

"I thought [this] was one of those unique experiences that's very hard to come by," said the third-year commerce student at University of Toronto. "It was enlightening. I didn't know a lot about Israel as a country, and I thought it was really informative."

"We're trying to have conversation and dialogue with people, sharing a couple of stories, talking about experiences in Israel," Brodt said, adding that the conflict isn't their only focus. Instead, the goal is to have a conversation with students simply to humanize Israelis.

"I hope we will hear each other, and speak to each other... and support each other," he said.

The WordSwap team were in Canada from Feb. 21 to March 3. Jewish organizations who helped them co-ordinate their trip included Hillel, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, among others. IAW is March 4 to 8 in Canada this year.

IAW is really a non-event for students

As we approach Israeli Apartheid Week (or IAW) in early March, we can expect the usual gathering of fringe activists to host seminars (most of which are sparsely attended) slandering the only liberal democracy in the Middle East. Their disgusting and false rhetoric will rightfully upset Jewish and non-Jewish supporters of Israel.

Guest Voice

David Koschitzky

To what extent does their inflammatory message resonate with average students? Very little it seems. Last year, an analysis by Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs stated: "In general media terms, IAW is a non-event. Israel Apartheid Week has not been successful in attracting mainstream media coverage." The report further noted that "Israeli/Jewish media outlets are now responsible for the bulk of media coverage of IAW."

This matches our own monitoring of IAW in recent years across Canada. The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) always considers our strategic advocacy efforts through the lens of our target audience. As a starting point, this means understanding that most students and faculty members devote very little (if any) consideration to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. To the bystander, the subject seems heated, ancient, and – most importantly – complicated. As such, average students are not interested in the aggressive, black-and-white narrative offered by IAW.

IAW organizers want to provoke Jewish students into a week-long shouting match on campus. We need to recognize that in organizing terms, this kind of on-campus conflict serves only to mobilize the anti-Israel base; it alienates the vast majority of students from both sides. By refusing to provide anti-Israel groups with the kind of direct conflict they seek, we are depriving them of the leverage to mobilize their own activists and push their agenda beyond a small fringe on campus.

This is not to say that we should allow the anti-Israel rhetoric of IAW to go unanswered. Especially given that – on occasion – anti-Israel activists have infringed the free speech and academic rights of Jewish and pro-Israel students. In this regard, we see three critical campus challenges that warrant our particular attention.

The first involves the primary issue of the well-being of students. Although rare, episodes of harassment and intimidation of Jewish and pro-Israel students are unacceptable and cannot go unchallenged. Despite evidence that this has diminished in recent years, we must remain responsibly vigilant on this point.

The second is the phenomenon of student governments being misused as a platform for symbolic, anti-Israel resolutions. We are not alone in this concern. Students of all backgrounds pay mandatory union fees with the expectation that their student government will address student issues, rather than irrelevant and marginal political agendas.

Third, we must continue to counter 'abuse of the podium'. On some campuses, particular faculty members involved with anti-Israel campaigns have brought their politics into the classroom – and in a manner of highly dubious academic value. Although this is worrisome, it is important to note that it goes against the grain; Canadian universities are substantially expanding ties with Israel. Through formal partnerships with Israeli institutions, influential Canadian faculties (law, medicine, and science to name just a few) are publicly rejecting calls to isolate Israel.

Through Hillel and grassroots activists, we are confronting the above challenges by making Israel relevant to non-Jewish students, faculty, and administrations – in ways that have proven to resonate. Our campus partners host engaging events and programming throughout the school year, because anti-Israel activism must be countered beyond a single week in March. The centre works with academics to foster university exchanges and collaborative projects, forging concrete relationships between the Jewish state and the next generation of Canadian business and academic leaders. This positive approach works to develop meaningful, long-term connections that pay dividends.

Israel's campus detractors naturally arouse our outrage at this time of year, for their message is outrageous. They must also inspire our ongoing, strategic efforts to counter the above three challenges. Given that these trends ultimately threaten the academic rights of all students, they warrant our continued focus, resources, and commitment to build winning relationships.

David Koschitzky is chair of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs – the advocacy arm of the Jewish Federations of Canada.

Mount Royal riding should stay as is: report

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The riding of Mount Royal will likely remain as is for the next federal election after the commission studying proposed changes to the federal electoral map recommended something close to the status quo.

The district's Liberal MP since 1999, former justice minister Irwin Cotler, who led the opposition to the elimination of Mount Royal, said he was "delighted" by the report of the Federal Electoral Boundaries Commission for Quebec that was tabled in the House of Commons on Feb. 25.

Irwin Cotler

"The initial proposal of the Commission called for the dismantling of the riding, erasing even the name 'Mount Royal' from the Quebec electoral map," he said. "I am delighted that today's report preserves this historic riding, benefiting both the communities and residents therein."

Mount Royal is one of two ridings in the country with a Jewish plurality. The other is Thornhill in the Toronto area.

The proposal was that the territory that is now Mount Royal, which was created in 1925, be split into three ridings, most of it in the proposed new John Peters Humphrey riding.

The former Mount Royal would have lost much of its eastern territory in Côte des Neiges-Snowdon and would have been extended west to include Dorval and St. Laurent. The city of Côte St. Luc, which is now wholly within Mount Royal, would have straddled two ridings.

But the commission recommends that Mount Royal stay virtually as it is.

John Peters Humphrey was the first director of the United Nations human rights division and the principal drafter of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Noting that Mount Royal's population is about 36 per cent Jewish, Cotler said at the commission's public hearings last fall that the changes would "dramatically undermine the 'community of interest and identity,'" one of the criteria that the law stipulates should be considered when drawing electoral district boundaries. Other ethnic communities in multicultural Mount Royal would also be adversely affected, he said.

The Council on Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), Federation CJA and its social services agency Ometz, as well as the YM-YWHA, the Jewish General Hospital, the Jewish Russian Community Centre and Congregation Shomrim Laboker also made submissions to the commission. They said Mount Royal should remain as it is, because carving up the territory would divide the community and separate it from its institutions.

"CIJA is very pleased that the commission took our recommendations into account and decided to leave this historical riding – important to the Jewish community – within the same boundaries, and keep the name Mount Royal," said Jonathan Kalles, the organization's associate director of government relations.

The commission's report will now be put before a Commons committee for debate prior to the next election in 2015.

Cotler said he's confident "the integrity of Mount Royal will remain and the recommendation of the commission for this riding will be confirmed."

Airport gets kosher catering

MONTREAL — Herb-encrusted rack of lamb with a balsamic jus nestled on polenta. Thai beef strips napped in ginger and soy. Braised short ribs atop roasted garlic-infused red-skinned potato mash.

Travellers flying out of Trudeau International Airport who order a kosher meal in the future may find such delectable fare on their tray.

Gate Gourmet, a Swiss-headquartered company that caters to 14 major airlines at Trudeau, including Air Canada, now has a kosher kitchen supervised by Montreal's Vaad Ha'ir, which supervises the MK hechsher.

The new service was launched Feb. 21, and the company says it will be able to supply up to 1,000 kosher meals a day.

The Vaad's executive director, Rabbi Saul Emanuel, is thrilled with the new venture, saying both observant Jews and many others who opt for kosher believing it represents higher quality will benefit.

Airlines, too, he said, will gain from working with an established international company that describes itself as the world's largest independent provider of catering and provisioning services to airlines and railroads.

Rabbi Emanuel has been trying to persuade Gate Gourmet to open a kosher kitchen in Montreal like the one it runs at Toronto's Pearson International Airport.

"Their services in Toronto have received excellent ratings," he said

Until now, airlines contracted with local kosher caterers to supply meals, and they still have that option the rabbi noted.

At the official opening of its Montreal kosher kitchen, located at offices on Rodolphe Pagé Street, a short walk from the terminal, executive chef David Tushingham showed off the type of kosher food Gate Gourmet offers.

Hate crimes debate probes free speech limits

Ron Stang
Special to The CJN

WINDSOR — Canada's hate crime laws may infringe on absolute freedom of speech, but they're no different from a range of laws that restrict freedom in some fashion, according to Mark Sandler, chair of the board of the Law Foundation of Ontario.

Alan Borovoy

Sandler, a former chair and legal counsel of the B'nai Brith League for Human Rights, was debating Alan Borovoy, former general counsel of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, in a Feb. 21 debate on hate crimes and Holocaust denial, at a public forum sponsored by Assumption University.

"Even the most fervent civil libertarians… do not advocate for the absoluteness of freedom of speech," Sandler said. "We recognize, for example, that it's a criminal mischief, to use the most trite example ever given, to yell fire without cause in a crowded theatre."

He said Canadian law also obviously provides sanctions against threats of bodily harm or death.

Sandler said libel and slander laws are other examples of laws that "curtail speech."

But he said that when it comes to the particular law regarding the wilful promotion of hatred against specific racial or religious groups, the issue is more complex, though ultimately valid.

Referring to the Supreme Court of Canada's definition of hatred arising from the 1990 case against Alberta teacher James Keegstra, Sandler said that "we cannot look at freedom of expression as if it is the only value, the only Charter guarantee, that exists."

Other guarantees include Section 15's "equality" clause that protects vulnerable groups. He said it's "not merely the impact that hate propaganda could have on the community at large, but the impact it has, regardless of whether it increases the number of adherents, on those who are targeted by the hate."

And Section 27 promotes multiculturalism. "We interpret all of our freedoms, including freedom of speech, having regard to the need to promote and preserve our multicultural heritage," Sandler said.

But even these parameters aren't sufficient to bring hate speech prosecutions.

Sandler said there must be "willfulness" as opposed to speech merely having "an effect," and someone must be an "instigator" and do so in the public realm against identifiable groups. As well, prosecutions must be approved by the attorney general, which is extremely rare.

"What a hill the prosecution has to climb before speech can be the subject of criminal prosecution," he said.

As well, Sandler said there are a series of defences, such as the truth of statements or relevance "to any subject of public interest the discussion of which is for the public benefit.

"We're not going to prosecute marginal conduct. We're not going to prosecute in the gray areas," he added.

But Borovoy said the "registering of a conviction is not the only way to judge these things."

He said he was concerned "by the prosecution that is initially threatened. You don't enjoy a viable free speech if you have to look over your shoulder worried that you're going to be charged or harassed for engaging in legitimate speech."

Borovoy acknowledged the various legal safeguards. But he asked "what happens to all those people in the real world who get harassed?"

He also said that despite supposedly clear definitions of hatred, "the human rights tribunals and courts out West were all over the map as to what hatred means," he said.

Borovoy would only limit free speech in extremely rare circumstances, such as a speech during the Rwandan genocide calling for the extermination of an opposing tribe.

"I'm not suggesting that the arguments I made to you could necessarily hold for all time and all places," he said. "I'm arguing that in Canada today this legislation is over the top and constitutes a number of threats that we ought not to incur."

Encyclopedia examines eastern European Jews

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Though he broke his ankle on a slippery sidewalk in Montreal, McGill University professor Gershon Hundert still showed up in Vancouver recently to talk about the YIVO Encyclopedia of Jews in Eastern Europe, a 2,400-page book he edited in 2008.

The book represents the work of 500 scholars over seven years, and its goal was to mediate and reflect the entire civilization of eastern European Jewry. Hundert, the Leanor Siegel Professor of Jewish Studies at McGill and the Itta and Eliezer Zeisler Memorial Lecturer, spoke at the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver last month.

'TumorGraft' technology helps oncologists treat cancer

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Rochelle Schwartz is not the kind of woman who takes no for an answer. Particularly when her husband's life is at stake.

A couple of years ago, Schwartz's husband, Yaron Panov, was told his cancer was inoperable and there was not much doctors could do to help him. He was given six months to live.

Schwartz, herself a physician, suspected that was not the case. She knew of new treatments available in the United States, and she had the gumption to take the bull by the horns and make things happen.

She contacted doctors south of the border and an American-based company with ties to Israel, Champions Oncology, a leader in innovative cancer treatments.

Champions' "TumorGraft" offers a model for growing and testing human tumours, providing oncologists with the best course of drug treatments for cancer patients. The procedure involves extracting cancer cells and the surrounding tissue, growing them in lab mice, and then testing various drugs on them to see which is best suited for that particular cancer in that particular patient.

The treatment worked and Panov is now several years past the deadline Toronto physicians had set for him.

Now, Schwartz is hoping a young Russian man can benefit from the same techniques that helped her husband. Andrew Avetikov is suffering from a particularly aggressive cancer. His family is staging a fundraising campaign to raise the money to send him south of the border to Champions, in the hope they can do for him what they did for Panov.

Avetikov was receiving chemotherapy last week and was unavailable for comment. However his cousin, Flora Krasnoshtein, said, "The family hopes that Champions Oncology will be able to give us information about specific mutations in Andrew's tumours via targeted sequencing analysis that they are going to perform, which in turn will enable the expert panel of oncologists to make a more informative decision about personalized treatment options that would help treat Andrew's cancer."

In 2009, Avetikov was diagnosed with cancer. He underwent treatments and his condition improved. But after being in remission for 2-1/2 years, a completely different cancer appeared and, "it's aggressive." That means, "it grows very fast and is hard to treat," said Schwartz.

Avetikov has been receiving treatment – powerful drugs administered intravenously. The result has been a lot of harmful side effects, but "nothing is working," Schwartz said.

She was alerted about Avetikov's situation by one of her patients from Toronto's Russian Jewish community.

Avetikov, like Panov a few years ago, is running out of options in Canada. But as for Panov, there may be treatments available south of the border.

Recounting Panov's story, Schwartz noted that after he underwent surgery in December 2010, they were told, "There's nothing [more] to do." Their only option in Toronto was massive surgery, the removal of organs, chemo with a small chance of success.

"I just couldn't believe that, so I got in touch with Champions Oncology," Schwartz said.

The principals behind the company are Americans who spend a lot of time in Israel. One of their implantation sites is in Rehovot; others are in Singapore, London and in the Baltimore area.

Following a teleconference with American doctors – Panov's Canadian doctors declined to participate – her husband's pathology reports were sent south.

A program of "personalized chemotherapy" was prescribed by Champions.

Rochelle Schwartz and her husband, Yaron Panov

Speaking from Israel, Champions' president Ronnie Morris explained the procedure as one that designs a chemo treatment regimen based on each particular patient's cancer.

Currently, doctors employ a "first line of treatment" that benefits 50 to 60 per cent of patients. For those who require more, the odds of success go down rapidly, he explained, to only 15 per cent in the second-round line and even lower in the third.

Doctors historically prescribe chemo or cocktails of drugs based on trial and error, but in recent years, researchers have attempted to tailor the chemo drugs to work specifically against a patient's particular cancer.

Champions developed a technique in which the whole tumour from a patient with all its supporting microenvironment are implanted into mice, thereby creating a very similar personalized model of their disease. Then they are able to take this patient's "live" growing tumour and test different groups of mice with treatments that the oncologist is considering giving to the patient. Once a drug or a combination of drugs proves efficacious against the tumours in the mice, they are used in treatment of the patient, Morris said.

"In terms of the success rate, once we find an answer, it has a 94 per cent success rate of working in the patient. The results that we empirically see in the mice are very similar to what we clinically see in the patient.

In other words, if the mice tumours shrink, disappear or remain stable, similar results are found in patients. That compares to the 15 per cent success rate for the "basket of drugs" used by doctors after the "first line of treatment."

The process can take from three to six months from the time the tumours are removed from the patients. In addition, it's expensive.

It's $1,500 to implant the tumours into the mice, and each drug test or combination of drugs runs $3,000 a test. Most patients require four or five rounds before the most effective cocktail is found; that's a total of $12,000 to $15,000.

The drug that was found for Panov made him sick, weak, and he lost his hair, "but it worked," Schwartz said.

Her husband, an engineer by profession, continues to take medication "to prevent the sarcoma from coming back," Schwartz said. One month's supply runs $10,000.

She said American doctors' attitude to cancer differs from what she's noticed in Canada. "They [Americans] turn cancer into a chronic disease and treat it with new drugs that come out all the time." It becomes something you manage, like diabetes, she said.

As for the costs of treatment, "OHIP did not pay anything for my husband's treatment… If you're not a doctor or an engineer, you can't afford it, so you die," she said.

Iran's nuclear program: a defiant quest for modernity

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Iran's quest to build a nuclear arsenal by hook or by crook has degenerated into a global crisis, having consumed the efforts of diplomats for the past decade.

Israel's threat to bomb Iranian nuclear sites, combined with U.S. President Barack Obama's determination "to prevent [Iran] from getting a nuclear weapon," as he stated in his State of Union speech to Congress last month, only amplifies the issue.

It remains to be seen whether it can be resolved peacefully, but as British journalist David Patrikarakos correctly observes in Nuclear Iran: The Birth of an Atomic State (Palgrave Macmillan), the need to find a solution is critical. Its resolution, he adds, "will affect the world for at least a generation."

Although Iran's nuclear program was launched more than 50 years ago, the full story of its development, from birth to the present day, has not been told until now. With this book, based mainly on primary sources, Patrikarakos fills in the gap admirably.

He's a dispassionate writer, but he doesn't bury his opinions. As he puts it, "If the spectre of a possible attack on Iran is deeply troubling, the prospect of a nuclear-armed Iran is worse."

Iran's possession of nuclear arms, he argues, would be catastrophic –strengthening the Islamic fundamentalist Iranian regime at the expense of its neighbours, further inflaming the already tense standoff between Iran and Israel, emboldening Tehran's proxies, Hezbollah and Hamas, setting off a regional arms race and prompting non-nuclear states in the Middle East to emulate Iran.

"It is a deeply undesirable outcome, one that must be avoided at all costs," he asserts.

In his view, the nuclear program offers Iran an opportunity "to engage with modernity" and "negotiate a place within a perennially hostile world." He adds, "Understand the nuclear program and you will understand modern Iran."

Iran, unlike its Arab neighbours, has never experienced the impact of direct colonialism, but it has been subjected to foreign meddling. Iran lost substantial territories to Russia in a war in the 1820s, and in the same decade, Iran was forced to cede land in Armenia and Azerbaijan. During World War II, the Soviet Union and Britain occupied Iran, and in the 1950s, a U.S.-backed coup deposed a nationalist prime minister.

As a result, he points out, Iran has been zealous to preserve its independence and territorial integrity.

Iran entered the nuclear age in 1957 when a nuclear training centre was established in Tehran under the auspices of the Central Treaty Organization, an alliance composed of Iran, Iraq, Turkey, Pakistan and Britain. Subsequently, Iran signed a treaty with the United States for co-operation on the peaceful uses of nuclear technology.

Mohammed Reza Pahlavi, the shah of Iran since 1941, believed that nuclear energy would lessen Iran's dependence on oil for domestic power, put an end to endemic electrical shortages and place his underdeveloped country on a path of industrial and economic progress.

With German assistance, Iran built its first nuclear reactor in Bushehr. By the end of 1978, the eve of the Islamic revolution that deposed the shah's monarchy, Iran had a civil nuclear program in place.

The Iranian government, having publicly rejected the allure of nuclear weapons, signed and ratified the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, but the shah warned he might revise his policy if "20 or 30 ridiculous little countries are going to develop nuclear weapons."

The shah's arrogant comment notwithstanding, Iran was really in no position to build an atomic device because its nuclear program was based entirely on power plants rather than uranium enrichment.

Nonetheless, as Patrikarakos notes, the nuclear program was probably the "most developed expression" of the shah's modernization program. Nuclear power, he elaborates, was "intertwined with notions of national pride and progress" and personal ambition on the part of the hubristic shah.

Yet in opposition circles, the nuclear program was synonymous with corruption, waste and royal excess. Frequent power cuts in the mid-1970s led critics to conclude that nuclear power was hardly a panacea for Iran's problems.

The new Islamic regime initially considered the nuclear program excessively expensive and ideologically unclean, calling it a Trojan horse for western infiltration and imperialism. Nevertheless, a decision was taken that nuclear research, particularly in prospecting and extracting uranium, should continue.

Severe electricity shortages convinced the mullahs that the shah's nuclear program could be useful. In 1982, with the Iran-Iraq War raging, the nuclear program was officially restarted. The program was now "an integral part of how the Islamic republic defined itself in the modern world," says the author.

Iranian scientists living abroad were invited back, and Iran began exploring the possibility of signing co-operation agreements with Argentina, Pakistan, India and China.

Convinced that a nuclear deterrent would confer prestige on Iran and protect the Islamic revolution from the schemes of its enemies, namely the United States and Israel, the regime took concrete steps to rebuild the nuclear program.

Iran secretly purchased centrifuges from the Khan network in Pakistan and bought equipment from China. Russia, however, would become Iran's chief nuclear partner. In 1994, the Russians agreed to complete one of two unfinished reactors in Bushehr.

Iran's belligerent attitude toward Israel, an undeclared nuclear power, prompted the Israeli government in 2002 to warn that Iran posed an existential threat to its statehood. With Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's election as president in 2005, Israel hardened its policy toward Iran's nuclear program.

By then, Iran had made headway in its covert pursuit of the full nuclear cycle and had officially informed the International Atomic Energy Agency of its uranium enrichment program, says Patrikarakos.

United Nations sanctions, he writes, had no effect on its nuclear ambitions.

He suggests that Iran's willingness to engage the major powers in talks has been little more than a stalling tactic. Iran regards its nuclear program as "a symbol of a defiant modernizing state" and will not likely abandon it in the face of international pressure.

Iran's defiance prompts Patrikarakos to write, "The supreme irony ... is that Iran's nuclear program is the ultimate expression of its desire for acceptance (but on its own terms) that is pursued through the one means that will ensure it remains a pariah."

Passover Food Ideas

Scrumptious salads...

Daphna Rabinovitch
Special to The CJN

I'm always a bit hesitant about suggesting salads for a food article. There's so much time and effort dedicated to planning a dinner party, let alone a Passover seder, that surely a recipe for a salad is not needed. You simply buy some lettuce, perhaps some sweet peppers, a red onion and cucumbers, slice them all and combine them in one of your loveliest serving bowls – not really much thought required.

Having said that, I also think it's a bonus to get some inspiration, a different way to select greens and accompaniments when you head to the grocery store.

This is especially so since the Passover meal is usually delicious but very rich. A salad or a salad course can help balance that richness, add texture and a refreshing edge to the repast. With that in mind, I offer some salads that are not only beautiful to look at but provide a welcome tangy element to the meal. The various elements of each salad can be made ahead as well, leaving the hostess only the chore of assembling the components just before the main event.

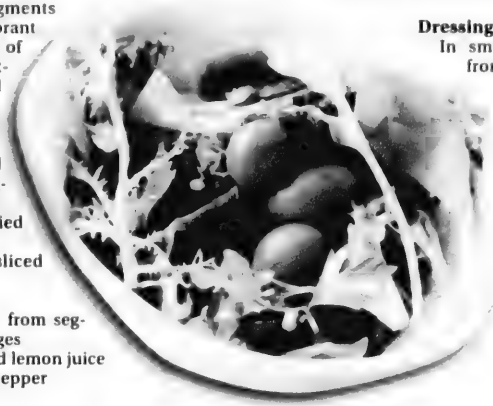
BLOOD ORANGE, LETTUCE AND DATE SALAD

Blood orange segments add colour to this vibrant dish as well as a burst of freshness. Lightly toasted sliced almonds lend crunch.

10 cups torn romaine lettuce
6 blood oranges, peel cut off and cut into segments (juices reserved)
1/2 cup chopped dried dates
1/3 cup toasted sliced almonds

Dressing

1/4 cup reserved juice from segmenting of blood oranges
2 tbsp. freshly squeezed lemon juice
1/4 tsp. each salt and pepper
pinch ground cinnamon
3 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil



Dressing

In small bowl, combine juice from blood oranges, lemon juice, salt, pepper and cinnamon. In thin steady stream, gradually whisk in olive oil until emulsified.

In large serving bowl, combine lettuce, orange segments and dates. Pour dressing over and toss gently until well combined. Top with sliced almonds. Serve immediately. Makes 8 servings.

BABY GREENS WITH AVOCADO AND HERBS

This delightful salad, full of herby goodness, combines the velvety smoothness of ripe avocado with the refreshing overtones of lemon and sherry vinegar.

10 cups assorted baby greens
1/2 cup torn fresh coriander leaves
1/2 cup torn fresh basil leaves
1/4 cup torn fresh mint leaves
2 avocadoes
4 tsp. freshly squeezed lemon juice

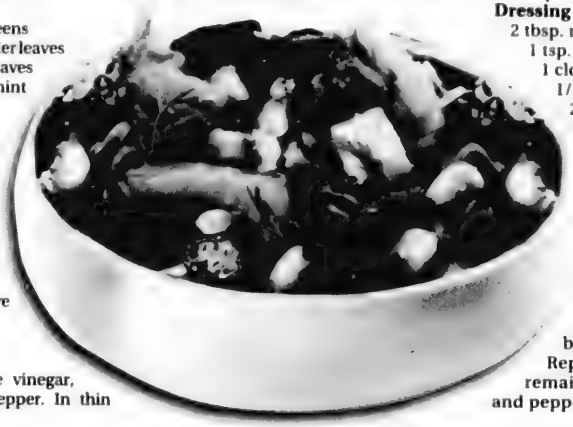
Dressing
2 tbsp. sherry vinegar
1 tbsp. freshly squeezed lemon juice
1/4 tsp. each salt and pepper
1/3 cup extra virgin olive oil

Dressing
In small bowl, combine vinegar, lemon juice, salt and pepper. In thin steady stream, gradually whisk in olive oil until emulsified.

In large serving bowl, combine assorted greens, coriander, basil and mint. Peel and cube avocadoes. Toss with lemon juice

Pour dressing over salad and toss gently until well combined. Mound avocado cubes over greens. Serve immediately

Makes 8 servings.



BEET SALAD WITH CHIVES AND PECANS

6 red beets
6 golden beets
2 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
1/4 tsp. dried thyme
1/4 tsp. each salt and pepper
1/4 cup chopped toasted pecans

Dressing
2 tbsp. red wine vinegar
1 tsp. kosher for Passover mustard
1 clove garlic, minced
1/4 tsp. each salt and pepper
2 tbsp. chopped fresh chives
1 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley

Preheat oven to 325. Keeping red and golden beets separate, wash beets well. Dry thoroughly.

Place red beets on large piece of aluminum foil. Drizzle with half of the oil, half of the thyme and half of the salt and pepper. Enclose beets tightly within the foil. Repeat with golden beets and remaining olive oil, thyme, salt and pepper.

Place both packages on rimmed baking sheet. Bake in centre of preheated oven for 1 to 1-1/2 hours or until a thin knife glides easily through beets. Remove from oven. Let cool. (Beets can be refrigerated for up to 24 hours. Bring to room temperature).

Dressing
In small bowl, combine vinegar, mustard, garlic, salt and pepper. In thin steady stream, gradually whisk in olive oil until emulsified. Stir in chives and parsley.

Still keeping beets separate and using two cutting boards to avoid any colour bleeding, peel and thinly slice beets. Place in separate bowls. Pour half of dressing into each bowl; toss beets gently until well coated with dressing.

Arrange beets in alternating rows on large serving platter. Sprinkle with pecans. Serve immediately. Makes 8 servings.

Note
These dressings can all be made and refrigerated up to 24 hours in advance. Bring to room temperature before adding them to salads.

Plan early to be ahead of Pesach stress

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

When it comes to preparing for Passover, I've learned over the years that nothing beats good organization. It's why I shop year-round for non-perishable Passover food, stashing it in a deep cupboard where it won't see daylight until the holiday draws close.

With a guest list that easily hits 20 or more each year, I find that being organized keeps the panic at bay and makes the holiday less stressful and more enjoyable – the food portion of the holiday, at any rate.

My to-do list before Passover is a long one, but the earlier I begin, the easier it is to manage. Here are my tips for staying one step ahead of the holiday.

• Plan your menu: I keep a document containing my annual Passover menus on my computer. A couple of months before Passover arrives, I print it and remind myself what worked the previous year, which recipes I might want to consider repeating and which ones were duds.

I cautiously begin creating a new menu, moving my stash of Passover cookbooks to my bedside table and mulling over combinations and ingredients in the evenings. By knowing what I need well ahead of time, I save myself rushing from store to store in a last-minute panic. I do this not just for the seders, but also for the Passover meals my family will have over the course of the holiday.

If I have a pre-determined meal plan, as well as a list of ingredients I need to make it possible, my shopping list is much more effective. This way, I can sleep easy with the knowledge that each night, there are at least a couple of dishes on the menu that the kids will eat – meaning I hope they'll consume something other than matzah for their evening meal.

• Set the Table: The table is the stage for a Passover meal and there's nothing that gives more pleasure to both a guest and a host than sitting down to a beautifully laid table. It can take awhile to organize a Passover table, given the number of items needed, so I like to start early – a tip I learned from my mother-in-law, who will lay her table up to a week ahead of time. As I collect the various accoutrements needed for the Passover table, I begin a list of items to purchase, from napkins to plastic frogs to wine and grape juice. Then I can be certain that this chore is complete and there's one less thing to think about. A set table also creates a sense of excitement and expectation in the family. The children are that much more aware that Passover is approaching and that with it will come shared family meals and a memorable seder.

• Start cleaning early: The cleaning necessary at this time is enough to stress any mother, particularly when much of it is done within hours of the seder and is added to the pressure of cooking a big meal. Again, I find starting early to be the ideal solution. I clear a few cupboards, put the unused, long-buried food products into boxes or the recycling bin and make a space that is purely for Passover. Once that's done, I can think ahead to the cooking.

• Budget your time: I plan my calendar, starting a week to 10 days before Erev Pesach, and I allot myself a Passover-related task for each day to make my life easier on the day of. Usually I begin with the day before Passover, planning those few hours and considering which dishes I'll need to make from scratch that day.

By working backwards and determining what I can't possibly make ahead of time, I start plotting what I can do in the days leading up to the seder. One day is dedicated to shopping, another to laying the table and others still for making dishes like charoset and herring, which are easily preserved in the refrigerator. Soup is done the day before, and slowly, by way of elimination, the meal is planned in such a way that on Erev Pesach, there's little fuss.

Chag Samayach

With spring just around the corner, Jewish cooks everywhere turn their thoughts to Passover, the eight-day celebration of the ancient Hebrews' liberation from slavery more than 3,000 years ago.

As kosher for Passover food items begin to appear on the grocery shelves, we start thinking about clearing our house of every trace of chametz, and taking out our special Passover pots, pans dishes and linens.

We also plan the seder, the ritual meal where we retell the story of the journey to freedom and the birth of the Jewish nation, and we picture in our minds the seder table set with the traditional wine, matzah, green vegetables, bitter herbs, charoset, salt water, roasted bone and cooked egg.

Most of all, however, we think about the food – what to serve at the seder and what to feed our families for the rest of the week.

In our food pages each year, we urge readers to concentrate on the wide range of food items available for Passover rather than lament over what they'll miss during these eight days.

We've provided a list of substitutions that helps convert year-round recipes into kosher for Passover recipes, and our writers have provided tips for making creative meals.

Whether you're preparing for Passover for the first time, or you're just looking for a few new recipes, our upcoming pages should have something for you.

The ingredients in all our recipes are acceptable for Passover use, and can be purchased kosher for Passover in most large Jewish communities.

From all of us at The CJN, we hope you will enjoy your Passover meals, and we wish you a chag kasher v'samayach.

Where's the wheat? Gluten-free sweets

Norene Gilletz
Special to The CJN

If you're looking for Passover-friendly desserts that are gluten-free, look no further. Here are some delicious recipes that are easy to make, taste terrific and happen to be gluten-free, wheat-free and dairy-free. And the best part is that none of your guests will notice that anything is missing!

According to an annual Kosher Today review of new kosher for Passover foods, gluten-free continues to lead the way in 2013. Many new items introduced in the past two years have remained on supermarket shelves year-round. Always check food labels carefully. If you are in doubt as to whether a product is gluten-free, contact the manufacturer directly.

This is a terrific time to stock up on some of the following gluten-free baking items which are more readily available for Passover:

- Ground almonds/almond meal/almond butter
- Potato starch, gluten-free matzah meal (check labels carefully)
- Passover marshmallows, jams, preserves and jellies
- Passover chocolate chips, bittersweet or semisweet chocolate, unsweetened cocoa
- Passover baking powder, Passover baking soda
- Passover icing sugar (made with potato starch)
- Gluten-free macaroons, meringue cookies, gluten-free Passover cake mixes and frostings.

Passover Gluten-Free Baking Substitutions:

- To replace 1 cup flour in baking, use 5/8 to 3/4 cup (10 to 12 tbsp.) potato starch.
- To replace 1 cup cake meal in Passover sponge cakes, use 1 cup finely ground almonds.
- To reduce fat and cholesterol, substitute 2 egg whites for 1 egg. You can usually replace up to half the eggs called for in baking recipes.
- When converting your baking recipes, use kosher for Passover baking powder and baking soda. They contain potato starch, whereas regular baking powder and baking soda contain cornstarch.
- Passover icing sugar: process 1 cup granulated sugar with 1/2 tbsp. potato starch in a food processor or blender for 2 to 3 minutes. The texture will be grainier than icing sugar.

Sweet wishes for a happy, healthy and delicious Passover. These gluten-free sweets are so good that you may decide to add them to your regular baking repertoire all year round!

NORENE'S FUDGY BROWNIES

Adapted from the NEW Food Processor Bible: 30th Anniversary Edition

These gluten-free-nut-free brownies are excellent for Passover – or any time of year. They freeze well – if they last that long!

4 eggs
1 3/4 cups sugar
1 cup oil
1 cup potato starch
3/4 cup unsweetened cocoa powder
1/4 tsp. salt

Preheat oven to 350. Spray a 9x13-inch baking pan with nonstick spray.

Insert steel blade in processor bowl. Process eggs and sugar for 1 minute, until light. Add oil through feed tube while machine is running. Process 30 seconds longer. Uncover and sprinkle potato starch, cocoa and salt over mixture. Blend in with several quick on/off pulses, just until combined. Pour into prepared pan and spread evenly.

Bake for 30 to 35 minutes. Cool completely.

Frost with your favourite chocolate frosting or glaze with Decadent Chocolate Glaze.

Rocky Roads: Five minutes before end of baking, sprinkle 4 cups miniature marshmallows evenly ever brownies. Return pan to oven and bake 5 minutes longer. Cool completely. Prepare Decadent Chocolate Glaze (below). Drizzle over marshmallow topping in a zigzag design.

Decadent chocolate glaze
2 oz./60 g semisweet chocolate
1 tbsp. honey
1 1/2 tbsp. hot water
1/2 tsp. Passover vanilla

Melt chocolate in microwave on medium (50%) for about 2 minutes, stirring once or twice. Add honey, hot water and vanilla and blend well. Use as a glaze for brownies and cakes.

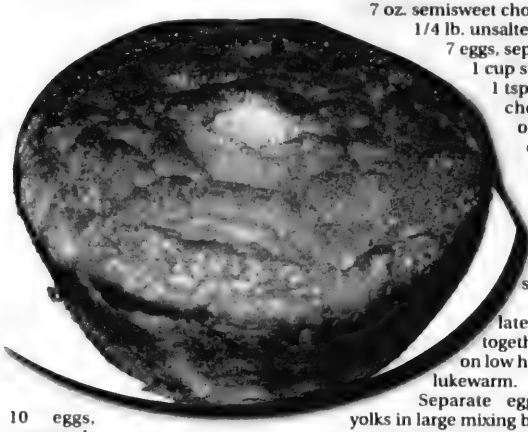
CHOCOLATE OR VANILLA SPONGE CAKE

My friend Helene Medjuck has been making this delicious, gluten-free cake for years. She got the recipe from her friend Susan Beckerman but has modified it slightly. Helene adds an extra egg and uses an electric mixer to combine the yolk mixture whereas Susan uses her food processor. The chocolate version is lighter in colour than regular chocolate cake but both ways are delicious. Helene says: "This nongebrochts cake is ideal whenever I have guests on Pesach because everyone is able to enjoy it!"



10 eggs, separated
1 cup sugar, divided use
1/2 cup oil
3/4 cup potato starch
1 package (3.3 oz.) Passover instant chocolate or vanilla pudding
Passover icing sugar and grated chocolate to garnish (optional)

Preheat oven to 350. Place egg whites in large bowl of electric mixer and bring to room temperature.

Beat whites on high speed, gradually adding 1/2 cup sugar. Beat until stiff, about 8-10 minutes. Set aside.

In another large bowl (or food processor), beat yolks with remaining 1/2 cup sugar until well mixed. Add oil and beat until light. Add pudding mix and potato starch and mix just until combined. Batter will get very thick.

Using a rubber spatula, gently fold whites into yolk mixture, just until whites disappear. Make sure to fold in thick batter at bottom of bowl.

Pour batter into an ungreased 10-inch tube pan. Bake at 350 for 1 hour. Immediately invert pan and cool completely.

Use a flexible spatula to loosen cake from sides, centre tube and bottom of pan. Remove cake carefully from pan and transfer to a cake platter.

If desired, sprinkle lightly with icing sugar and grated chocolate. Makes 15 -18 slices

DECADENT CHOCOLATE MOUSSE CAKE

Marilyn Abram kindly shared her recipe for this gluten-free smooth and silky dessert that she got from her cousin, Karen Truster. The cousins have been making their Passover seders together for at least 15 years, if not longer, and this cake is always on their menu. Marilyn told me: "This amazing dessert is easy and foolproof. If you love chocolate, you'll really love this!"

7 oz. semisweet chocolate
1/4 lb. unsalted margarine
7 eggs, separated
1 cup sugar, divided use
1 tsp. Passover vanilla
chocolate leaves or shavings or chopped nuts for garnish

Preheat oven to 325. Grease bottom and sides of a 9-inch spring form pan.

Melt chocolate and margarine together in a saucepan on low heat. Let cool until lukewarm.

Separate eggs, placing egg yolks in large mixing bowl.

Place egg whites in another bowl and let stand until room temperature.

Beat yolks with 3/4 cup sugar until fluffy, about 5 minutes. Slowly add warm chocolate mixture and vanilla; mix until combined.

Beat egg whites on high speed, gradually adding remaining 1/4 cup sugar, until stiff peaks form. Fold chocolate mixture into egg whites.

Pour 3/4 of the batter into prepared spring form pan and spread evenly with a rubber spatula. Cover remaining batter and refrigerate.

Bake at 325 for 35 minutes, or until top of cake is set and cake pulls away from sides of pan. Remove from oven and let cool. (Cake will drop as it cools.) Remove outside of pan.

Stir refrigerated batter to soften it slightly and spread on top. Refrigerate until firm.

Garnish with chocolate leaves or chocolate shavings and chopped nuts. Serves 8-10.

Note: The refrigerated mousse-like batter used to top the baked cake contains uncooked eggs. If you prefer, bake the entire batter in step 8, increasing baking time by about 10 to 15 minutes. Sprinkle top of cooled cake with icing sugar and garnish with chocolate shavings.

Substitutions for the week

Eileen Goltz
Special to The CJN

At some point during Pesach preparations, we've all tried to convert a regular recipe, only to discover that we don't know what to substitute for a chametz ingredient. This is why I started compiling my list of Passover substitutes. I've added some new substitutions this year. If anyone has any other substitutions to share please let me (eztlog@gmail.com) know.

•1 oz. baking chocolate (unsweetened chocolate) = 3 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus 1 tbsp. oil or melted margarine
•16 oz. semi-sweet chocolate = 6 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus 1/4 cup oil and 7 tbsp. granulated sugar
•14 oz. sweet chocolate (German-type) = 3 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus 2 2/3 tbsp. oil and 4-1/2 tbsp. granulated sugar
•1 cup confectioners' sugar = 1 cup granulated sugar minus 1 tbsp. sugar plus 1 tbsp. potato starch pulsed in a food processor or blender
•1 cup honey = 1-1/4 cups granulated sugar plus 1/4 cup water
•1 cup corn syrup = 1-1/4 cups granulated sugar plus 1/3 cup water, boiled until syrupy
•1 cup vanilla sugar = 1 cup granulated sugar with 1 split vanilla bean left for at least 24 hours in a tightly covered jar
•1 cup flour = 5/8 cup matzah cake meal or potato starch, or a combination sifted together
•1 tbsp. flour = 1/2 tbsp. potato starch
•1 cup corn starch = 7/8 cup potato starch
•1 tsp. cream of tartar = 1-1/2 tsp. lemon juice or 1-1/2 tsp. vinegar
•1 cup graham cracker crumbs = 1 cup ground cookies or soup nuts plus 1 tsp. cinnamon
•1 cup bread crumbs = 1 cup matzah meal
•1 cup matzah meal = 3 matzot ground in a food processor
•1 cup matzah cake meal = 1 cup plus 2 tbsp. matzah meal finely ground in a blender or food processor and sifted
•3 crumbled matzot = 2 cups matzah farfel
•1 cup (8 oz.) cream cheese = 1 cup cottage cheese pureed with 1/2 stick butter or margarine
•chicken fat or gribenes = 2 caramelized onions. Sauté 2 sliced onions in 2 tbsp. oil and 2 tbsp. sugar. Cook until the onions are soft. Puree the onions once they are golden.
•1 cup milk (for baking) = 1 cup water plus 2 tbsp. margarine, or 1/2 cup fruit juice plus 1/2 cup water
•1 cup wine = 13 tbsp. water, 3 tbsp. lemon juice and 1 tbsp. sugar. Mix together and let set for 10 minutes.
•for frying: instead of chicken fat, use combination of olive oil or vegetable oil and 1 to 2 tbsp. pareve Passover margarine.
•eggs: Passover egg substitutes don't work quite as well as the chametz substitutes. For kugels, matzah balls, fried matzah and some cakes, the recipes will probably be okay. However, if you want to avoid them (and I do) you can add one extra egg white and 1/2 tsp. of vegetable oil for each yolk eliminated when baking. Use only egg whites as the dipping to coat and fry meats.
•1-1/2 tsp. Italian seasoning = 1/4 tsp. each dried oregano leaves, dried marjoram leaves and dried basil leaves plus 1/8 tsp. rubbed dried sage.
•2/3 cup curry powder = 2 tbsp. ground coriander, 1 tbsp. black pepper, 2 tbsp. red pepper, 2 tbsp. turmeric, 2 tbsp. ground ginger
•Pancake syrup: use fruit jelly, not jam and add a little water to thin. I always like to combine the jelly and water in a microwave safe bowl and heat it gently before I serve it.
•1/4 cup seasoned rice wine vinegar = 3 tbsp. white vinegar, 1 tbsp. white wine, 1 tbsp. sugar, 1/2 tsp. salt
•flavoured vinegar = lemon juice in cooking or salad, grapefruit juice in salads, wine in marinades.
•water chestnuts: substitute raw jicama
•orange liqueur: substitute an equal amount of frozen orange juice concentrate.

You can mince the tops of green onions and use them in recipes that call for chives.

Consider unilateral separation from West Bank: Barak

JTA

WASHINGTON — Israel should consider unilateral steps to separate itself from the Palestinians if peace talks fail, Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak said.

Such steps would include dismantling settlements beyond the separation barrier and maintaining a military presence in the Jordan Valley along the West Bank-Jordan border, Barak said Sunday at the annual American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) policy conference in Washington.

"We should consider unilateral steps in order to place a wedge on this extremely dangerous slippery slope to a binational state," he said.

Barak, who is leaving government, has been the chief advocate within the government of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu for advancing talks with the Palestinian Authority.

On Sunday, he told AIPAC that Netanyahu had been a "courageous" advocate for peace, noting his freeze on settlement building in 2010, and that the failure of the talks was "mostly" the fault of the Palestinians.

Ehud Barak

His warnings about the dangers of a binational state also come at a time when Israel's leaders are more preoccupied by Iran and domestic social issues.

Barak cited the American euphemism for possible military action: "All options must be on the table – we expect all those who say it to mean it," he said.

Canadian Foreign Minister John Baird, also speaking at the conference, expressed skepticism over negotiations regarding Iran's nuclear program.

"We must be clear and unequivocal – we will not back down on sanctions and pressure just for Iran showing up at the negotiating table," Baird said, referring to recent talks between the major powers and Iran to set the terms for negotiations on access to Iran's nuclear program.

Iran insists its nuclear program is peaceful, while western intelligence agencies believe it is close to having the capability to manufacture a nuclear weapon.

Hungarian Jews create antisemitism monitor

JTA

BUDAPEST — Hungary's Jewish communities have created a watchdog organization on antisemitism modelled after the Anti-Defamation League.

The Budapest-based, nongovernmental entity was registered recently in Hungary as the Action and Protection Foundation, or TEV by its Hungarian-language acronym, and is set to have six employees and about 20 volunteers by June, according to Daniel Bodnar, chair of the organization's board.

Bodnar said TEV is made up of delegates from the major organizations representing Hungarian Jews.

"We decided to create this body out of the realization that antisemitic statements have become more common and acrimonious as public discourse continues to deteriorate in Hungary, a country which unfortunately has a strong, par excellence neo-Nazi party in its Parliament," Bodnar said in reference to Jobbik, the country's third-largest party.

In November, a senior lawmaker for Jobbik said in Parliament that Jews needed to be listed as "security threats," drawing international condemnations and triggering several protest rallies in Hungary.

"A body which monitors and counters this phenomenon is now sadly a pressing necessity for the Jewish community because it is affecting the quality of life of this community of about 100,000 Jews," Bodnar, a leading member of the Chabad-affiliated EMIH, Unified Hungarian Jewish Congregation, told JTA at EMIH's Budapest offices. TEV will be headquartered in a nearby building, he said.

The Hungarian authorities do not collect data specifically relating to antisemitism, according to the European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights' annual report for 2012.

Bodnar added that despite verbal and political antisemitism, "physical attacks are very rare, virtually nonexistent, in Hungary and are not comparable with what we see in France and other western European countries."

"We need to instil the awareness that any offence can and needs to be reported – an awareness that exists in the U.S. and other western countries," he said.

Hamas warns Obama against Temple Mount visit

Elhanan Miller
The Times of Israel

Responding to unconfirmed rumours that U.S. President Barack Obama intends to visit the Temple Mount in Jerusalem during his trip to Israel this month, Hamas recently warned the American leader against the idea.

The terror group called it "a diplomatic catastrophe," in a statement issued on Feb. 26, and local Muslim leaders set stiff conditions for a presidential tour there.

Hamas said Obama's potential visit to the Al-Aqsa Mosque, located at the southern perimeter of the mount, is "an imminent danger that the Al-Aqsa Mosque and Jerusalem have never faced."

Hamas stated that a visit by the American president to the contested site under the auspices of "the Zionist occupation" would be more dangerous than the relocation of any country's embassy to Jerusalem, considering the international pre-eminence of the United States.

Ekrima Sabri

The Temple Mount, revered by Jews as the site of the First and Second Temples, and by Muslims as the point from which Muhammad ascended to heaven, is administered by the Jerusalem Islamic Waqf, a trust that has governed the site since the 12th century.

Ekrima Sabri, who used to administer the Temple Mount as mufti of Jerusalem and currently heads the High Islamic Council in Jerusalem, told the Times of Israel that Obama would be allowed to visit the site only if he abided by three conditions.

According to a protocol drafted by the Waqf in 1967, official visitors may enter the Temple Mount through any of its 11 gates, excluding the Mughrabi Gate, which is connected to the Western Wall plaza by a bridge.

"The Israeli army stole the keys to that gate from the Islamic Waqf, so entry through that gate gives the impression that Israel has sovereignty over Al-Aqsa," Sabri said.

"We insist on Muslim sovereignty over the Temple Mount," he said.

Israel took control of Jerusalem's Old City, including the Temple Mount, in the 1967 Six Day War.

The other conditions placed by the Waqf on Obama's visit are that no Israeli official accompany the president onto the mount, and that the visit be of a sight-seeing rather than a political nature.

Sabri said that in the past, visiting officials – including French president Jacques Chirac, Pope John Paul II and Pope Benedict XVI – abided by the Waqf's regulations.

"If Obama does not abide by these rules, we will refuse to accept him in Al-Aqsa," Sabri said, adding that his organization intended to send a petition to the American consul general in Jerusalem next week outlining its conditions and protesting Israeli attempts to "Judaize" Jerusalem.

The White House gave no indication that Obama actually planned to visit the Temple Mount.

A visit to the site by former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon while he was opposition leader in September 2000 is widely regarded as the immediate precursor – Israel says it was a pretext – for the outburst of the second intifadah, marked by a strategic onslaught of Palestinian terrorist attacks against Israel, and referred to by Palestinians as the Al-Aqsa intifadah.

'Ignorant, hateful attack on the Jewish People'

In a March 4 interview with the Jerusalem Post, Baird said he "deplores" Erdogan's remarks and that they are "incredibly unhelpful."

Rabbi Pinchas Goldschmidt, chief rabbi of Moscow and the head of the Conference of European Rabbis, said Erdogan's criticism of Zionism amounted to antisemitism.

"This is an ignorant and hateful attack on the Jewish People and against a movement with peace at its core, which relegates Prime Minster Erdogan to the level of [Iranian President] Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and to Soviet leaders who used anti-Zionism as a euphemism for antisemitism," Rabbi Goldschmidt said in an emailed statement.

"The irony of these comments will not be lost on the families of those slaughtered during the Armenian genocide, a crime still not recognized by the Turkish government," he added.

About 17,000 Jews live in Turkey, a country of 76 million people.

UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon's spokesperson issued a statement March 1 condemning the remarks. "The secretary general believes it is unfortunate that such hurtful and divisive comments were uttered at a meeting being held under the theme of responsible leadership."

UN Watch, a Geneva-based watchdog group monitoring anti-Israel bias and human rights abuses at the organization, also condemned the Turkish leader's remarks last week.

In a statement, the group also criticized the UN chief – "who was present on the stage yet stayed silent" – for not immediately condemning Erdogan's remarks.

"We remind Secretary General Ban Ki-moon that his predecessor Kofi Annan recognized that the UN's 1975 Zionism-is-racism resolution was an expression of antisemitism, and he welcomed its repeal," it said in a statement.

David Koschitzky, chair of Canada's Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, in a letter to Tuncay Babali, Turkey's ambassador to Canada, urged Erdogan to publicly apologize to Israel and the Jewish people "as an important first step toward undoing the damage caused by his offensive remaks and wrong-headed policies."

Rabbi Pinchas Goldschmidt

Israel and Turkey enjoyed close diplomatic and business relations for years until a gradual deterioration accelerated after the May 2010 Gaza flotilla incident, in which clashes between pro-Palestinian activists and IDF troops aboard the Mavi Marmara ship resulted in the deaths of nine Turkish citizens and injuries to several Israeli soldiers. Relations between Ankara and Jerusalem have since remained sour, with Turkey demanding an apology and compensation for the families of those killed as prerequisites for the warming of ties.

In related developments earlier last week, a report on xenophobia in the Turkish media said Jews and Armenians had the most hateful writings against them of any group in Turkey.

The report by the Hrant Dink Foundation, a human rights watchdog, is based on material that appeared in 16 national circulation newspapers and another 1,000 local publications between last September and December, according to an article about the report that appeared Feb. 28 in Hurriyet, a Turkish daily.

The researchers found 39 instances of anti-Jewish writings in Turkish newspapers during the period, which accounted for 25 per cent of the total of hateful articles. The levels were slightly lower for Armenians. The third most targeted group was Christians with 18 per cent.

Will Obama postpone visit?

U.S. President Barack Obama will call off his imminent visit to Israel if Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has not managed to form a new governing coalition by March 16, an Israeli television report said last week. Obama is due to arrive in Israel on March 20 for a working visit, his first as president.

Netanyahu seeks more time

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu met with President Shimon Peres last week to request an extension in forming a government. Under the law, Netanyahu can ask for an extension of up to two weeks, which Peres has said he'll approve.

No violence or foul play

The preliminary results of Arafat Jaradat's autopsy revealed no signs of violence or poisoning, Israeli pathologists said Feb. 28, contradicting previous statements by a Palestinian doctor who attended the procedure. Jaradat died Feb. 23 of what Israeli officials said was a heart attack while in custody at Megiddo Prison. The Palestinian Authority was quick to lay blame at Israel's feet, following the report of a Palestinian pathologist who attended the Feb. 24 autopsy and determined the 30-year-old gas station attendant had been tortured to death and had not died of cardiac arrest. A team of Israeli doctors, pathologists and forensic specialists reported, based on an examination of microscopic remains from Jaradat's body that "no evidence was found of poisoning and no evidence was found of physical violence." According to a Health Ministry statement, Jaradat's internal bleeding and fractured bones were characteristic of the 50 minutes of resuscitation attempts made by prison and emergency response staff to save his life.

Hospital, church aid kids

An Israeli hospital near Tel Aviv is partnering with the Living Bread International Church to provide medical care to children in Gaza and the West Bank. The Jerusalem-based church and the Assaf Harofeh Medical Center are calling the project "Rescue the Child." Israeli and Palestinian authorities have approved the co-ordination of the project and the moving of the patients from Gaza and the West Bank into Israel for treatment.

Iranians aid Hamas

Iranian rocket specialists are in the Gaza Strip helping terror groups develop their arsenal of projectiles, Palestinian security officials said Feb. 26, hours after a rocket was fired at Israel for the first time in months. Representatives of the Iranian Revolutionary Guard are helping Hamas and Islamic Jihad develop long-range rockets, the Hebrew news site Walla reported, citing the unnamed Palestinian officials. Israeli officials confirmed there is an Iranian presence in Gaza, adding it isn't the first time Iranian officials have entered the strip, said the report, which could not be independently confirmed.

Syria elected to UN decolonization committee

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Apparently, when it comes to elections to plum United Nations positions – such as rapporteur of a decolonization committee – representing a country that murders its own people in the tens of thousands does not disqualify you.

Last week the permanent representative of the Syrian government, Bashar Jaafari, was unanimously re-elected as rapporteur of the UN Special Committee on Decolonization.

Jaafari will serve as a special rapporteur to oppose the "subjugation, domination and exploitation" of peoples.

Meanwhile, the UN itself has accused the Syrian regime of killing 70,000 of its own people in a bloody civil war that has raged for more than two years. The UN High Commissioner for Refugees has accused Syria of victimizing women by using rape as a weapon of war.

Recently, Vuk Jeremic, president of the General Assembly, joined Navi Pillay, the UN's high commissioner for human rights, in criticizing the lack of an international response to Syrian violence.

UN Watch, a non-governmental organization based in Geneva, called on UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon, as well as U.S. and European diplomats, to condemn the "revolting and absurd" re-election of Jaafari.

Posters of Syrian President, Bashar el-Assad, can be found throughout the country even though his regime, fighting for its life. The UN has accused the Syrian regime of killing some 70,000 Syrian civilians. [Wikimedia Commons photo]

"The UN is helping the Assad regime portray itself as a UN human rights arbiter. That's indefensible and an insult to Syria's victims," said Hillel Neuer, director of UN Watch.

"It's contradictory and it makes no sense," Neuer told The CJN.

While senior UN officials speak out against Syrian atrocities, "the system of elections is entrenched. It's immoral and amoral," he said.

Neuer attributed Jaafari's re-election to purely political considerations – backroom horse-trading on an international level. Positions in UN bodies are apportioned on a regional basis, and regional groups vote for colleagues in exchange for support later. The result is that some of the worst human rights offenders seek and attain prestigious posts on human rights bodies.

"The sad reality is that in the UN system, mass murderers get elected to high posts," Neuer said.

In addition to Jaafari's re-appointment, Syrian representatives were elected in November 2011 – while the massacres were ongoing – to two UNESCO human rights committees. As well, Sudan was named to a senior position on ECOSOC (Economic and Social Council), while Pakistan, Kazakhstan and Venezuela, all human rights violators, were named to the UN's Human Rights Council.

Countries that are human rights violators seek these sorts of appointments to deflect attention from their own human rights records, and the Syrian news agency SANA is already trumpeting Jaafari's appointment, Neuer said.

Late last week, a UN venue was again the scene for an anti-Israel diatribe.

Speaking at the Vienna forum of the Alliance of Civilizations, a UN body for west-Islam dialogue and tolerance, Turkish Prime Minister Tayyip Erdogan called Zionism a "crime against humanity" and compared it to antisemitism, fascism and Islamophobia.

Ban sat silently through Erdogan's statements, which UN Watch characterized as the misuse of a global forum "to incite hatred" and "Ahmadinejad-style pronouncements," a reference to Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's repeated anti-Israel and antisemitic statements.

Young playwright tackles the Holocaust

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Reflecting on her exacting craft, Canadian playwright Hannah Moscovitch talks about the difficult trick of "pulling something from nothing."

"I tend to write without knowing where I'm going," she explained in an interview. "I believe in the emergence of an idea while I'm writing. I write to find an idea."

This method may seem chaotic to those who prefer a tightly scripted outline. But for Moscovitch, spontaneity is extremely important. Indeed, it is her modus operandi in the creative process, her passport to a world of imagination.

Judging by the arc of her career, Moscovitch's approach has served her rather well.

At the age of 34, she is one of Canada's most accomplished young playwrights. The Tarragon Theatre's playwright-in-residence, Moscovitch has written 11 plays since 2005, some of which have won Dora Mavor Moore Awards and one of which was nominated for a Governor General's Award.

With a new year having begun, Moscovitch is in the news again, thanks to her association with Toronto's Tarragon Theatre. Until March 24, it is staging four of her plays – In This World, This Is War, Little One and Other People's Children, her newest play. All four plays will hit the road after that.

As well, she is writing a play for the Stratford Festival and the Manhattan Theatre Club, working on an adaptation of Anne-Marie MacDonald's novel, Fall on Your Knees, and adapting Alison Pick's novel, Far to Go, for the screen.

In addition, she is working on a new play about Jewish gangsters. "I love badassed Jews," she said with a glint of mischief in her eyes.

As reviewers have consistently observed, Moscovich's talent lies in an ability to mix tragedy with humour and leaven intellect with emotion.

"There is always dark humour in my work. I'm interested in showing a world that is complex, where people can be very malicious or very generous. We have a great capacity for good and evil. It's hard to understand people without understanding their complexity."

Moscovitch, originally from Ottawa but now based in Toronto, discovered her niche while studying acting at the National Theatre School in Montreal, in which she enrolled after spending several months on a kibbutz in the Galilee.

Hannah Moscovitch

Upon discovering that she was more interested in achieving contact with the text of a play rather than in wringing the meaning out of it as an actor, she dashed off her debut play, Don't Walk Alone, in 1999. Read and work-shopped at the National Theatre School, it was a turning point for her. As she observed, "It became immediately evident to me that I was better at playwrighting than acting."

Nonetheless, she remained in the National Theatre School's acting program. But after graduating, Moscovitch rejected an opportunity to audition for a role at the Stratford Festival and thereby effectively turned her back on a career as an actor. "I was not that fond of acting," she said. "I felt called to writing. I had a vision of the world I wanted to communicate."

Moscovitch moved to Toronto to realize her dream, but it was a hard slog. As she continued to hone her skills as a budding playwright, she settled down to complete a BA in literature at the University of Toronto.

To support herself, she took odd jobs as an actor and a drama teacher, and toiled as a server and bartender at a restaurant, where she was exposed to a sexist environment and the vagaries of human behaviour.

"My life was uncertain and unstable," she recalled.

But persevering, Moscovitch wrote Essay, a play concerning gender politics in academia and staged in 2005. She took a further step forward in 2006 with The Russian Play, a romance that unfolds during the Stalinist era in the former Soviet Union.

By this juncture, she was no longer a student, having dropped out of the University of Toronto. "My dad jokes I'm the only member of the family without a degree," she chuckled.

Her Jewish father, Allan Moscovitch, teaches economics at Carleton University, while her Catholic mother, Julie White, works as a labour researcher. Moscovitch's younger sister, Sarah, is an intern at a publishing company.

With East of Berlin, premièred at the Tarragon Theatre in 2007, Moscovitch hit her stride as a professional playwright. As she put it, "I had worked out my voice and learned how to structure a play."

Looking back, she believes that two events catapulted her to her current status as one of Canada's leading playwrights.

The Russian Play, written when she was a University of Toronto student, was picked up by the Magnetic North Theatre Festival in Ottawa. Shortly afterward, the Tarragon Theatre mounted a production of East of Berlin.

In retrospect, she agrees that these plays were of the utmost importance. "I got offered a bunch of commissions from theatres across Canada," she said. "I was now on their radar."

Two of her plays, East of Berlin and The Children's Republic, have delved into the Holocaust.

Moscovitch, who was brought up Jewish, was drawn to the Holocaust when she was 12. "I was obsessed with it," she said. "I remember asking my father: how many people is six million?"

East of Berlin, her first foray into this genre and the recipient of the Governor General's Award nomination, turned on the legacy of the Holocaust and focused on the relationship between the son of a Nazi war criminal and the daughter of an Auschwitz concentration camp survivor.

She submitted The Children's Republic after writing In This World, which deals with racial and sexual politics, and The Huron Bride, a treatment about the supernatural.

The Children's Republic, set in the Warsaw Ghetto, was produced in 2009 and was inspired by her visit to Poland as a teenage participant in the March of the Living, an annual educational tour of former extermination camps.

"It had an incalculable effect on me," she mused. "The Holocaust is never far from my thoughts. It overshadows my life. I see extremes of human behaviour in the Holocaust."

Apart from connecting her to such an horrific and unprecedented event, the March of the Living forced Moscovitch to sadly acknowledge that some Jews do not even consider her Jewish.

During the trip to Poland, an Orthodox rabbi pointedly questioned her identity as a Jew. His comments left a bitter taste in her mouth: "I went to Hebrew school. I had a bat mitzvah. We kept kosher. I went to temple. I know all the prayers."

Since the March of the Living, Moscovitch has adopted an ambivalent approach to her Jewishness. When she was asked whether she considers herself Jewish, she replied, "Yes and no. I identify completely, yet not at all."

Moscovitch, however, remains deeply Jewish. She plans to marry her fiancé, the theatre director Christian Barry, with whom she has worked, in a Jewish ceremony. The wedding date is set for the summer of 2014.

'PLAYFULLY PROVOCATIVE' FILM COWJEWS AND INDIANS TO HEADLINE TORONTO JEWISH FILM FESTIVAL

Marc Halberstadt's "playfully provocative" film CowJews and Indians will be the headliner at this spring's Toronto Jewish Film Festival, TJFF organizers announced last week.

In a nutshell, CowJews and Indians offers a quirky Swiftian modest proposal as its main thesis. North American Jews are owed reparation money from Germany for the Holocaust, the filmmaker observes, and native Americans are owed reparations from the Europeans who deprived them of their lands. The thesis is that natives should "skip the middleman" and seek reparation payments directly from Germany.

"I think Marc is an idiot for even coming up with the idea," said former Mohawk chief Cheryl Jacobs about the film. The quote comes directly from the TJFF's promotional material, which further describes the film as "Borat meets Michael Moore."

But the filmmakers and producers earnestly describe CowJews and Indians as "a serious, unflinching yet entertaining examination of both Jewish and native American displacement, and the contributing causes." It was screened at a Beverley Hills film festival last November but positive comments about it on the Internet seem highly elusive.

The festival opens April 11 and closes 10 days later with Hava Nagila, a cinematic "look at the history of the song that represents both kitsch and continuity." tjff.com, 416-324-9121.

Top Israeli clarinetist to perform in Canada

Marvin Glassman
Special to The CJN

Israeli clarinetist Anat Cohen is on top of the music world. She has been voted as clarinetist of the year six years in a row (2007 to 2012) by both the Jazz Journalists Association and Downbeat Magazine. She has been compared to Benny Goodman and Artie Shaw, who are considered by many as the greatest clarinetists in history.

Cohen will be performing in concert March 8 in Edmonton and March 9 and10 in Winnipeg. There are no other Canadian shows planned as of yet.

"Being clarinetist of the year is an honour that I will never take for granted, and I appreciate all the support from the jazz music critics and my fans. Lots of people associate the clarinet as exclusively for folk music and klezmer music, but the clarinet is a prime musical instrument in jazz as well," the 36-year-old Cohen said in a phone interview.

In her upcoming concerts, Cohen will play music from the latest of her six CDs, Claroscuro, which features 11 songs that range in style from New Orleans to Brazilian and New York City jazz. Released last October, the CD has been praised by jazz writers as showcasing Cohen's innovative arrangements on both the clarinet and the saxophone.

"I enjoy playing different styles of jazz. I pay tribute to Artie Shaw in La Vie En Rose and feature New Orleans jazz in And The World Weeps on Claroscuro."

Anat is not the only Cohen in her family to have become an acclaimed musician. She often joins brothers Avishai and Yuval on tour in concert, calling themselves The Three Cohens.

Anat Cohen

The Cohens all excelled as jazz musicians in Israel where they grew up. The trio has strong roots as well in Boston, where they studied music at the Berklee College Of Music.

Avishai Cohen, the youngest of the trio, plays the trumpet, and elder brother, Yuval, plays the soprano saxophone.

"We all had talent and were influenced by the jazz recordings that we heard from our father in the house. I took to jazz when Avishai played the trumpet. But our skills became honed when Berklee did recruiting in Israel for all of us to get music scholarships. First, they wanted Yuval, then me and then Avishai," Anat Cohen said.

As The Three Cohens, Anat and her brothers recorded the CD Family last year.

However, Anat has been the most acclaimed of the three, and is astute as both an artist and a music entrepreneur.

She has released her six CDs on her Anzic Records label, including the highly acclaimed Clarinetwork (2010), a salute to Benny Goodman on his centennial.

Cohen studied classical music at age 12, but switched to jazz in high school, playing for the Jaffa Conservatory Dixieland Band. Prior to enrolling at Berklee, she served in the Israeli military, playing in the Israeli Armed Forces Band.

"Our soldiers put their lives at risk every day, so it was a great honour to play for them, and [I was] proud of all I achieved, even before going to Berklee".

After graduating from Berklee in 1998, Cohen developed world music genres in Afro-Cuban, Argentine tango, Brazilian, klezmer and other world music genres.

"Oddly enough, most of us think of klezmer as Jewish music, but the minor sound in the clarinet is found in other cultures as well. The great thing about playing music is that I think of myself as an international musician with no borders."

Although she has lived in New York for the past 20 years, Cohen is considered a music ambassador for Israel.

"I feel blessed that people view me as an ambassador of music for Israel, even if I perform not only in Israel, but all over the world."

Anat Cohen will perform March 8 at 9 p.m. at Yardbird Suite in Edmonton. For tickets, call 780-432-0438 or go to www.yardbirdsuite.com.

She will also do three shows March 9 at 8 p.m. and March 10 at 2 p.m. and 7:30 p.m. at Rady Jewish Community Centre Winnipeg. For tickets, call 204-477-7534 or go to www.radyjcc.com

New symphony features the sounds of Toronto

Marvin Glassman
Special to The CJN

Classical music composer Tod Machover has created a most unusual gift for Toronto residents.

As part of this week's annual Toronto Symphony Orchestra's New Creations Festival, Machover worked with some 10,000 collaborators for almost 15 months via the Internet to create A Toronto Symphony: Concerto For Composer And City, which will have its world premiere March 9 at Roy Thomson Hall.

Torontonians collaborated with Machover and the TSO by blog and email, Skype and smartphone, using audio and video recording and streaming, and through numerous face-to-face meetings and music-making sessions in the city.

"I love collaboration. Music should be central in people's lives. Today, music is often an afterthought as background to riding the elevator or shopping at a mall. So, the idea of collaborating with Torontonians to create a symphony interested me, both because I thought it would lead to a diverse and timely musical portrait of this wonderful city, and also because I felt that it would propose a new model for people with diverse musical backgrounds and experience to work together towards a common goal," said Machover, 59.

"We embarked on an adventure that has led me to new sounds, new friendships, new discoveries about Toronto, and new ideas about musical storytelling. When I started the project, my hope was to convey how the incredible diversity of Toronto is wrapped in a beautiful and unified connectivity. The audience will hear and also see the sounds of Toronto on the subway, in the parks and streets, dancing and walking, to create the beautiful mosaic of ethnic groups that make up Toronto."

Tod Machover

To add to the excitement of the world premiere of A Toronto Symphony: Concerto For Composer and City, the CN Tower will feature a customized light show synchronized with the music to be heard at Roy Thomson Hall.

"Our city needs a symphony of our own, and it was due to Tod's vision and the thousands of collaborators in Toronto, [that we could] create a music composition that will make us all proud," said TSO music director Peter Oundjian, who will conduct the new composition.

Machover is widely regarded in music circles not only for his imaginative compositions, but for being a leader in music technology as well – his mother is a pianist and his father is a computer scientist. The composer has created new instruments to augment the sound of traditional instruments, including the hypercello, hyperpiano, hyperviolin and hyperscores, all invented by him at the Massachusetts Institute Of Technology in 1986.

"The hyper instruments involve computers that augment and enhance the sound. The result is that the cello not only has a rich and vibrant sound, but could be accessed in the musical spectrum to also sound like other instruments. I am also proud of hyperscores, which is a visual device that can help novices compose music."

Machover's innovative technologies and approaches to composing music have made him a sought-after collaborator.

He created an opera titled Death And The Power, featuring singers, visual screens and robots that enhanced the music. The 2010 opera debuted in Chicago and was praised by opera fans for its innovations.

Machover has also worked on creating new composition for cellist Yo Yo Ma and violinist Joshua Bell among other artists, and he was a finalist for the 2012 Pulitzer Prize in Music.

He hopes to visit Israel soon. "I am very proud of my Jewish roots and want to go to Israel and perhaps work with the many gifted musicians there," he said.

Tod Machover's A Toronto Symphony: Concert For Composer And City, has its world premiere March 9, 8 p.m., at Roy Thomson Hall in downtown Toronto. Also on the same program on the final night of the TSO New Creations Festival will be Four Angels, composed by Andrew Staniland, and Steven Mackey's Four Iconoclastic Episodes. For tickets, call 416-593-4828 or go to www.tso.ca.

Jaffa Road thrilled about Juno nomination

Toronto multi-ethnic band Jaffa Road has been nominated for a Juno Award for its sophomore album, Where the Light Gets In, which was released in October last year.

This is the second nomination for Jaffa Road, whose first album, Sunplace, was nominated for a 2010 Juno Award, also in the World Music Album of the Year category.

Vocalist Aviva Chernick called it a dream come true to receive this recognition. "It brings Jewish culture forward to the Canadian cultural sphere," she said. "We're part of a whole movement of people who are slowly edging Jewish culture more into the main so it's not ghettoized, so that it can be celebrated as a voice in our national arena."

The band blends influences from Jewish, Ladino and Indian music, jazz, and more.

Guitarist and oud player Aaron Lightstone said he was overwhelmed with feelings of excitement and accomplishment, as well as gratitude when he heard the news.

"We also saw the other nominees, and my first thought was that we're in some pretty good company," he said. "The competition is pretty stiff."

Even if Jaffa Road doesn't win, the band will feel honoured to have been included in the category, Lightstone said. "There are some great albums that didn't even get nominated."

Chernick said she is thrilled to find the band nominated in the same category as Danny Michel, whose album, Black Birds Are Dancing Over Me, is her current favourite.

"It's the album we play in my house to dance around to and share joy, and I couldn't believe it, that we're nominated with him," she said.

Jaffa Road spent almost a year on and off working on the newest album, said Chris Gartner, bassist and producer. It was the result of a collaborative effort involving a team of people that includes four guest artists.

It's a huge accomplishment that a group with Hebrew music and obvious Jewish influences could reach such mainstream appeal, band members say.

"As much as we value and appreciate the support we've received from the Jewish community, we have a bit of a bigger vision for the band and what we think the band could do," Lightstone said.

He added that the band's success shows that Canadians are open to any kind of artistic expression. "There are other cultural communities doing this sort of thing – taking an aspect of one cultural heritage and putting it in the blender with everything else that's around us in a multicultural mix and producing something new," he said.

Chernick said Canadians who speak Hebrew can turn on the radio and hear their language, and people have thanked her for contributing to that effort. "They heard a piece of themselves on the radio," she said. "That's the joy for me."

Lightstone said he found the group was being taken more seriously after the first Juno nomination. If he wants to play at a festival, for example, having the nomination attracts attention from the organizers.

"Even if we don't end up getting the gig, at least I get call-backs now," he said.

He also thinks it helped put a spotlight on the band, helping it stand out in the vast Canadian music scene.

It "makes it a little easier to be noticed in that very large crowd where there is a lot of high-quality music coming out of Canada," he said, adding that he is looking forward to the awards ceremony for the opportunity it presents to connect with this network of acclaimed musicians.

Chernick said she is also looking forward to the ceremony, which she described as intimate despite being in a large room.

"You get to hear people speak about their journeys making the music. It feels good to be a part of it all," she said. "It's like other artists, working away in the woodshops, fine-detailing the piece for hours and hours, and all of sudden you get to be with people who appreciate it, and it makes it come alive."

She said she's especially looking forward to representing the community of people who have supported the band over the years.

The 2013 Juno Awards take place on April 21 in Regina.

Fichman plays key role as Canada advances in Fed Cup

Marvin Glassman
Special to The CJN

MIAMI — Sharon Fichman of Toronto led the way for Canada to advance in Fed Cup tennis play with three wins in singles and two in doubles against four nations at the Americas zonal competition in Colombia recently.

The Canadians will now play in Ukraine in the world Group 2 playoffs in April, reaching the Group 2 playoff for the first time since 2011.

Fed Cup tennis is a year-round global competition for women involving 64 nations, much as Davis Cup is for men.

Fichman and her three teammates were impressive in combining to defeat their opponents with a stunning 9-1 win-loss record over the three days of competition. Fichman played both singles and doubles, as the number 2 seeded Canadian, behind Eugenie Bouchard.

After sweeping Peru 3-0, Venezuela 3-0, and host nation Colombia 2-0, the Canadians had a tougher time in the final round-robin matches against Brazil. In the first match, Fichman won the first set easily 6-0 against Paulina Goncalves, but the Brazilian rallied in the final two sets to win the match 0-6, 6-0, 6-4 to give Brazil a 1-0 lead.

"I lost concentration and did not fight as hard as I should have. Goncalves deserves credit for coming from behind for the win," Fichman said following the loss.

Bouchard evened things for Canada at 1-1 after she beat Telina Pereira 6-2, 6-2 to set up the final match in doubles.

Fichman teamed with Gabriela Dabrowski in a hard fought doubles win 7-6(4), 7-5 over Pereira and Laura Pigossi to defeat Brazil 2-1 and advance to the Group 2 playoffs.

Trailing 2-5 in the opening set, Dabrowski and Fichman rallied with two breaks of service to take the first set to a 7-4 tie break win and broke serve once in the second set for the decisive victory against the Brazilians.

"I felt much better with the doubles win for my team after I lost. It was a doubles match that we could have easily lost, but Gabriela and I fought hard and pulled out the win," said Fichman, who celebrated the win with her teammates by rallying around the Canadian flag after the final match.

"Sharon showed much heart, with her belief in herself and fought hard in every match," Canadian Fed Cup coach Sylvan Bruneau said. "I was especially impressed how she rallied following her loss."

Prior to the final round-robin matches against Brazil, Fichman contributed to Canada's victory by defeating Katerina Miranda-Chang of Peru 6-2, 6-2 and Andrea Gamiz of Venezuela 6-1, 7-5, as well as having a 6-2, 6-1 doubles win with Dabrowski against Ferri Angles Paz and Ximera Siles-Luna of Peru.

"Hopefully, our Fed Cup will keep the positive momentum going... in Ukraine," Bruneau said.

The 22-year-old Fichman is the first Jewish player to play Fed Cup for Canada since Vicki Berner of Vancouver who played from 1964 to 1968. Fichman has a total win-loss record of 20-6 since she started playing Fed Cup in 2005.

Since the Fed Cup competition, Fichman has improved her ranking to 128th (as of Feb. 25) on the pro tennis circuit, her highest since being ranked No. 114 in March 2010.

"Winning in Fed Cup has given Sharon a lot of confidence. I expect her ranking to continue to climb this year," Bruneau said.

Fichman finished her junior career ranked fifth in the world in 2006, and she won the prestigious Orange Bowl junior title in 2003.

She was born in Toronto two years after her parents immigrated from Israel in 1988. Her parents moved to Israel from Romania in 1983.

Fichman started playing tennis at age five, following her brother Thomas, who was a top Canadian player in the 14-and-under category. She is the youngest athlete, at age 14, to have won a gold medal at the Maccabiah Games in Israel, which she did in 2005.

Should Jesse Levine play Davis Cup for Canada in April as expected, Fichman and Levine would become the first Canadian Jewish man and woman to play Davis and Fed Cup in the same year since 1968.

PRESIDENT & CEO
JVS TORONTO

JVS Toronto is a dynamic, not-for-profit agency that partners with both the government and business sectors to help people succeed. For more than 60 years JVS has been connecting people from all walks of life with work. Our mission is to help people by providing outstanding employment, social and educational services which meet the changing needs of the communities that we serve, building on our experience serving the Jewish community.

At this transformational time in our history we are seeking a visionary leader to be our President & CEO.

You will build upon our many successes and accomplishments and lead the agency to new heights as it considers new ways to meet the growing and diverse needs of the community. You will be an inspiring, innovative and strategic leader with significant experience in leading an organization through a changing and challenging environment.

Reporting directly to the Board of Directors, with five direct reports, you will represent and advocate for the agency with integrity and passion.

You will also ensure our sustainability and prosperity by identifying, building support for, and developing new lines of business for growth and expansion. Superior inter-personal skills along with the ability to foster a collaborative environment will be central for your success. You will also coach and mentor a strong and dynamic team of approximately 165 talented and committed professionals.

You will have a minimum of 15 years of progressively more responsible management experience including experience in budgeting and strategic planning. You will be comfortable working in a multi service organization with multiple funders. Your experience working with not-for-profits, community agencies and/or diverse stakeholders will contribute to your success. Expertise in fundraising and board development are essential. Experience in marketing and public relations is also desirable.

This is an exciting opportunity for an engaging and experienced leader and strategic thinker to make a significant contribution to JVS Toronto and the community we so proudly serve, and to effectively position JVS for a bright future. A competitive compensation package is being offered.

Interested candidates should submit their resumes in confidence by March 28th to: mkane@ujafed.org Only those candidates considered for an interview will be contacted.

IDF prepares for security threats from Syria

Ben Sales
JTA

KATZRIN, Israel — For nearly 40 years, Israel's border with Syria has been, perhaps improbably, its quietest.

The two countries technically have been in a state of war since the ceasefire that ended the 1973 Yom Kippur War. But over the past four decades, while Israel's other borders occasionally have exploded with missile salvos, intifadahs, shooting incidents and cross-border terrorist attacks, the Syrian frontier on the Golan Heights has stayed largely peaceful.

With Syria now entering a critical phase in its bloody, two-year civil war, however, the years of quiet may end. The Syrian fighting has claimed an estimated 70,000 lives, according to UN officials, and recently spread to Damascus, Syria's capital city. Analysts warn that the regime of President Bashar Assad could collapse in a matter of months or even weeks.

In its place may come Islamist terrorist groups seeking to take advantage of the power vacuum and attack Israel on the Golan border, Israelis fear.

"There won't be a country called Syria," said Oded Eran, a former Israeli ambassador to Jordan and the European Union. "Then there's no central rule. It creates a vacuum for terrorists to enter the space. It will be a wonderful opportunity to attack Israel."

Analysts do see some bright spots to the fall of Assad, whose regime is a key ally of the Hezbollah terrorist group and Iran, and serves as Iran's main corridor for funnelling arms to Hezbollah. A Syrian rebel victory would hinder that corridor.

That would be "a major blow to Hezbollah and Iran," said Eyal Zisser, a Syria expert at Tel Aviv University. "Hezbollah will stay there, but it will be much weaker."

But Prof. Mordechai Kedar, a Syria expert at Bar-Ilan University, says Israel could face increased danger in the near future. In the long term, Kedar said, Assad's regime may be replaced by a government more amenable to peace with Israel. But before he falls, Assad might transfer his large stock of chemical weapons to Hezbollah.

The Syrian conflict already has spilled over into Israel – a bit. In November, stray Syrian shells landed across the boundary, prompting Israel to fire back. In January, Israel reportedly bombed a weapons convoy heading from Syria into Lebanon that was thought to be carrying weapons for Hezbollah. Last month, seven Syrian men injured in fighting just over the border were brought into Israel and are being treated at an Israeli hospital.

Israeli soldiers are on high alert on the Golan Heights. [Flash90 photo]

In the meantime, security officials are beefing up measures in the Golan to prevent any additional spillover into Israel from the Syrian conflict. Last month, Israel announced that it would begin building a fence along its Syrian border, as it has done along its border with the Sinai.

Should the Syrian region adjacent to the Golan descend into anarchy, experts expect it to most closely resemble the Sinai. Terrorists there have taken advantage of diminished control following the overthrow of the former Egyptian leader's Hosni Mubarak regime in Cairo to smuggle in weapons and launch occasional attacks into Israel.

One significant difference between the Sinai and Syria, some analysts say, is that the Sinai is ruled by a central Egyptian government with which Israel has a formal peace accord, thus limiting Israel's military options. Operating in an anarchic Syria would not carry the same diplomatic risks.

"What's happening on our border is what's happening in Sinai," said Ely Karmon, a Hezbollah expert at the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya. "But with Sinai, we have a peace agreement with Egypt. We don't have freedom of action in Sinai like we have in Syria. If there will be terrorist acts, I assume Israel will react hard."

Pazit Ravina, a columnist for the Israeli newspaper Makor Rishon who has been in contact with Syrian rebels adjacent to the Golan, says that Sunni and Shiite Muslim terrorist groups may not attack Israel because they will be too preoccupied fighting each other for control of Syrian territory.

"They're very tired," Ravina said. "There is not enough food. They'll be busier fighting Sunni-Shia battles than fighting Israel. It's all kinds of groups, and trying to unite them against Israel doesn't work."

For now, analysts say, Israel's options are limited. They say its best bet is to protect its border and stay out of the Syrian conflict, but react forcefully should a Syrian group try to attack the Golan. The Israeli government, which declined to comment for this story, appears to be following that policy. Other than that, analysts say, Israel should push the United States to prevent Syria from becoming a base of Iranian influence.

N.Y. couple killed in accident

JTA

NEW YORK — A New York Jewish couple was killed in a hit-and-run accident on the way to the hospital to have their first baby.

Nachman and Raizi Glauber, 21-year-old Satmar Chassidim from Brooklyn, were killed late Saturday night while riding in a cab to Bellevue Hospital in Manhattan. The driver and passenger of the car that hit the cab fled on foot and have not been identified, the New York Post reported.

The couple died of head injuries, according to the Post. The baby was born in the hospital and was in serious condition, but was initially expected to survive. However, a community spokesperson said the child died around 5:30 a.m. Monday morning.

Potash Corp determined to buy Israeli company

JTA

VANCOUVER — A Canadian fertilizer company is determined to buy a major Israeli chemical company, despite opposition among MKs and employees of the Israeli company.

Potash Corp of Saskatchewan is seeking to acquire a controlling stake in ICL, Israel Chemicals Ltd., Israel's second-largest corporation by market size.

More than 20 Israeli lawmakers met in Jerusalem on Feb. 27 to discuss the issue, with some voicing strong opposition to the deal, according to Bloomberg.

"The sale of ICL to a foreign company would be abandoning residents of the Negev region and a slap in the face of every citizen of Israel," Yesh Atid MK Meir Cohen was quoted as saying.

Potash Corp is the largest producer of the potash crop nutrient and currently owns a 14 per cent stake in ICL, which mines chemicals from the Dead Sea and is the world's sixth-largest producer of potash.

"The opposition you're seeing now is fear of the unknown," Potash Corp chief financial officer Wayne Brownlee said Feb. 26. Brownlee, speaking at a conference in Florida, said Potash Corp wouldn't cut production or lay off ICL employees.

But that hasn't placated Israel Chemicals employees, who plan to stage protests in coming weeks to try to block the deal, according to Reuters.

Before discussions begin between the companies, Potash Corp must secure approval from the Israeli government, and talks are currently suspended due to "political events," Brownlee said Feb. 26. Israel is currently in the process of forming a new government.

The removal of water from the Dead Water to mine lucrative chemical products such as potash has been blamed for the shrinking of the popular natural attraction. The flow of water into the sea was 100 million cubic metres in 2008, down from 1.4 billion cubic meters in 1948 when Israel was founded.

In additional to fertilizer, potash is also used to make glass and soap.

Camp friends to embark on 5,000-km canoe trip

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Marc Soberano has never canoed for more than two weeks at a time, but this summer, he's planning to spend at least four months retracing routes taken by early explorers of Canada.

The 23-year-old is planning to spend up to five months paddling in a canoe with five friends from Rocky Mountain House, Alta., to Lachine, Que. He's hoping a 5,000-kilometre canoe trip will be the ticket to figuring out what to do when he comes back, since he graduates from the Richard Ivey School of Business at the University of Western Ontario just before leaving on May 10.

"I'm hoping a flash of genius comes to me somewhere along the way – that the light bulb goes off and I'll figure out what I want to do for the rest of my life," he said.

The Toronto native spent time canoeing as a child attending Camp White Pine in Haliburton, Ont., but he met his five friends at Camp Tamakwa in Algonquin Park, Ont. All six of them worked at the camp as canoe trippers, which means they would take campers out on canoe trips.

Soberano said his love of canoeing doesn't have as much to do with the actual activity, but rather being outside spending time with friends.

The group, which is now called Paddling Across Canada Tour (PACT), was initially called Six Friendly Voyagers, which Soberano described as a perfect description of the team, and why he chose to participate.

The idea for the voyage began when one of Soberano's friends, Peter Vooys, had a hernia. Although it wasn't life threatening, it left him with a reminder that life is unpredictable, so he decided he wanted to go on this big adventure, Soberano said.

The team ranges in age from 22 to 31, and includes three Canadian men and one Canadian woman, one Australian man and one American woman.

The group is working away at preparing for the trip, with a mandate that each day they should get one step closer to making the trip happen, said Soberano.

"The planning that goes into this is like nothing I've ever attempted before," he said, adding that it's especially difficult given that no two members of the group live in the same city. Five are spread out in Ontario and one is in Colorado, so much of the planning happens online.

The planning involves figuring out how to evacuate if there's an emergency, or where they will resupply food, but also finding funds both for the trip and for charity. Although fundraising has been slow going so far, Soberano said he hopes they'll be able to donate to three charities that offer outdoor opportunities. These charities are Camp Outlook, Couchiching Community Initiative and the Pine Project.

Soberano said his trip isn't unique – lots of people have paddled along these routes in the past, and that means there's a wealth of information and people ready to offer advice. For example, his friend's sister's boyfriend did this trip two summers ago and has shared his experiences with Soberano.

"One segment of the trip is paddling Lake Superior – it's essentially like an ocean. At any moment the wind could pick up, and sometimes they had to sit on the shore for five to seven days waiting for the wind to calm down," he said. "That's going to be the one where we're going to be the most careful."

He'll be sharing his own experience through photos, stories, music and blogs that will be updated online throughout the journey.

This trip is the longest Soberano will be away from the Jewish community, which he thinks will make for an interesting situation.

"Hopefully, I'll let my years of Jewish education give me energy and perspective," said the graduate of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and United Synagogue Day School, who compared canoe trips to Shabbat, in that you sit around and talk with friends, without worrying about getting caught up in other parts of your life.

"Every time I've been on trips, that's when I get most spiritual," he added.

He's most looking forward to visiting the various cities he'll be paddling through, including Edmonton and Winnipeg.

"Any time we see a little civilization, it'll be interesting," adding that he hopes to meet people along the way who might offer help to the group through what he called random acts of kindness. "There's bound to be times where morale gets kind of low. The thing that keeps people going is the people they meet along the way that are enthusiastic about the trip."

Although there is still a lot to do to prepare, Soberano said he's looking forward to spending months paddling in this six-person canoe and is confident the journey will be a success.

"As long as we're making a bit of progress every day, we'll make it happen," Soberano said.

"אני מוטרפת, מודאגת ועצבנית!" צועקת טלי כשאנו מתיישבות. "תזמיני לי דבל אספרסו דחוף, לפני שאני משתגעת!" אני מזמינה בחשש, ומוסיפה ליתר בטחון גם ארבע עוגות שוקולד ושישה קרואסונים. שיהיה.

אני: אז מה קורה, ממי? ממה את כל כך משתגעת?

טלי: לא משנה. לא רוצה לדבר על זה, תעשי לי טובה.

אני (מושכת בכתפיי בהשלמה): טוב, אז בואי נדבר על הסיילים של ...

טלי (קוטעת אותי): אני בהלם ממך. את לא מתכוונת לשאול אותי מה קורה?!

אני: אבל הרגע שאלתי אותך ואת אמרת...

טלי: אז אמרתי. אז מה. עכשיו תתייחסי לכל שטות שאני אומרת? את לא רואה שאני שקטה מופנמת ומכונסת?! אולי עובר עלי משהו? מה עם הקפה כבר?!

אני: שקטה מופנמת ומכונסת... כן, בהחלט. אז מה עובר עלייך, מתוקה?

טלי: אי פעם סיפרתי לך על המזכירה החדשה של בעלי?

אני: אתמול בערב והבוקר בטלפון...למה מה קורה? דווקא אמרת שהיא בחורה טובה אחראית וחכמה, אחת עם ראש על הכתפיים.

טלי: ליטרלי! איפה הצוואר שלה?... אבל עזבי. לפני כמה דקות הוא מתקשר ואומר "אני צריך לנסוע לדיונים מחוץ לעיר. נישאר שם עד מחר". קולטת?!

אני: בטוח אין לו רומן איתה. השתגעת? (ואחרי שנייה) ניראה לך שיש לו?

טלי: תגידי את חושבת שאני איזו פוסטמה נאיבית שלא יודעת מהחיים שלה?

אני (בבהלה): קראת את היומן שלי? לא, ברצינות. הוא לא בוגד בך. בחייך מי תשים עליו? (ושוב בבהלה) אני מתכוונת, אמרת שהיא רק בת 27 לא? ואגב להבא, את בוחרת לו את המזכירה האישית. במשך כל חיינו מאיר ידע לבחור אך ורק מזכירים ממין זכר, ותמיד הכל הסתדר. חוץ, כמובן, מרוברט הרקדן לשעבר. שמעתי שהוא התגבר על הקראש ממאיר, בעזרת פסיכיאטר טוב.

טלי: טוב, תפסיקי לבלבל את המוח ותקשיבי לי. החלטתי. אני הולכת עכשיו הביתה, מוציאה את כל הבגדים שלו מהארון וזורקת אותם לבריכה. נכון, היא ריקה כי חורף, אז לפני זה אני גוזרת אותם. אחר כך אני הולכת לעורך דין ו... (הסלפון שלה מצלצל והיא עונה) מה אתה רוצה! (מאזינה) עכשיו? איך אני אתארגן כל כך מהר? מה אתה צריך. שתי עניבות. וגם את הז'קט האפור. ביי.

PASSOVER MOLTEN CHOCOLATE CAKES

3 c semi-sweet chocolate chips
½ c margarine spread
1 tbl coffee powder, (mixed with few drops hot water)
3 tbls cocoa powder
6 eggs
1 c sugar
2 tbls potato starch
1 tbl vanilla extract

Preheat oven to 375°F. Melt chocolate, margarine, coffee and cocoa over very low heat. In food processor; beat eggs and sugar until light and fluffy. Add slightly cooled chocolate mixture and mix. Add potato starch and vanilla; pulse until just combined. Pour mixture into 8-10 greased ramekins or muffin tin; bake about 12 min., or until tops are barely set and center is still slightly wet. Watch baking closely after 12 mins. Do not overbake or center will solidify. If too runny, return to oven for another couple minutes. Hating Jews, hating the Roma

Only recently have I started to learn about anti-Roma (Gypsy) sentiment.

I've read the books, listened to hateful radio shows hosted by such angry people as Ezra Levant and talked to people involved in the Roma community and people outside of it. This education helped me to understand what antisemitism is all about.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

We didn't have a homeland. The Roma still don't. The Conservative government recently ran an advertising campaign in Hungary to tell the Roma not to come to Canada. Hungarian leadership responded by saying, if any Roma left Hungary for Canada and were rejected, they could not come back. At that moment, it became clear to me what homelessness as a people meant and how it must have translated for our grandparents living in Germany and Poland. They were destitute. They were without protection. They were hated. That is the Roma in 2013. Actually, they are despised.

In my mind, I saw a Gypsy in 2012 begging for a country to embrace them as world citizens, as creations of God. This vision looked terribly similar to a Jew in Germany in 1933, 1934, 1935... in 1945. The Jewish children, the Roma children, looked to their father for safety. He returning their gaze, saying, "We have nowhere to go."

The Roma are second-class citizens, and they are vermin in the eyes of the world, just as we were. In the 1930s, our children were kicked out of school. Today, culturally biased psychological testing often leads to non-disabled Roma children being placed in schools for the learning disabled. The Roma are targeted by the Canadian government, just as we were.

In 1948, the Jewish People legally secured a homeland – Eretz Yisrael. Countries like Canada stopped messing with us. That was not the fortune, however, of the Roma, who lost 500,000 of their people during World War II (some say more than one million). They remained stateless wanderers and were denied reparations by the German government. They, therefore, continue to fight for the safety of their children, unlike us, who have established ourselves in Israel and around the world. We have it made; the Gypsies did not.

At 52 years old, I am utterly aghast at what our people went through during the war, and before and after. In many ways, the suffering of the Jewish People is synonymous with that of the Gypsies and the terrible experiences they are enduring throughout Europe and now in North America. I am astounded at the hatred directed toward the Roma. Stunned.

We must defend the Roma. We must stand behind them when called upon to do so; protect them by standing in front of them when they need cover, and walk hand in hand with them until the world embraces their rich culture and sees them as brothers and sisters, equal in the eyes of God and human within the psyche of all nations.

We said, "Never again." What did we mean? Our Torah says 39 times, "Know the stranger," because we were slaves in Egypt. How will we explain this to our children on Pesach? Invite a local Roma to your seder. Call Roma Centre director Gina Csanyi-Robah at 416-561-0770. She'll help. Or support International Roma Day on April 8, by attending a music fundraiser on March 13 at Lula Lounge in Toronto.

Ask our government, why is it targeting the Roma? Then ask yourself what Holocaust education taught you.

New Israeli government imminent

Stuart Winer
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu bade farewell to his cabinet on Sunday, expressing confidence in the imminence of a coalition deal that would usher in a new cadre of ministers.

"This is probably the final meeting of this government," Netanyahu said at the opening of the weekly cabinet session. "I wish to thank all of the ministers for their fantastic work over the past four years."

The meeting was shunned by the outgoing ministers from the haredi Shas party, who have been fuming over their exclusion from a coalescing government that they perceive as being anti-haredi.

At a meeting of Likud ministers before the cabinet meeting, Netanyhau said most of the policy principles for the next government have been agreed upon, and all that remains is to settle the matter of ministerial portfolios.

Representatives from the Likud-Beiteinu, Yesh Atid and Jewish Home parties met Sunday afternoon to try to push through a final agreement that was apparently snagged on which party will fill the education minister's chair. Likud was reportedly determined to see party member and current Education Minister Gideon Sa'ar maintain his position, while Yesh Atid wants the post to go to MK Rabbi Shai Piron.

At the opening of the cabinet meeting, Netanyahu praised the outgoing government's achievements, saying, "This government will be remembered as one that achieved more than almost any other government in Israel's history."

Venezuelan Jews hold their breath

Uriel Heilman

Analysis

For more than a decade, Venezuelan Jews have been holding their breath, subject to the whims of a mercurial president who used his pulpit to bully, intimidate, rail against Israel and embrace Iran.

The police raided a Caracas Jewish school in 2004, allegedly to search for evidence in the high-profile murder case of a prosecutor. When war broke out between Israel and Hamas in December 2008, President Hugo Chavez demanded that Venezuelan Jews rebuke Israel for its conduct in Gaza. Chavez developed a warm alliance with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, and Venezuelan state radio was used to spread antisemitic canards.

Most recently, there were revelations that Venezuela's intelligence service, SEBIN, was spying on the country's Jewish community.

While Chavez never explicitly threatened the Jews of Venezuela, his frequent harassment and staunchly anti-Israel positions kept them continually on edge. Afraid to criticize their president, the Jewish community found itself in a predicament that took on a frightening resemblance to the one faced by Jews in another staunchly anti-western, anti-Zionist country: Iran.

Radler Heads Paper

VANCOUVER — David Radler, ex-newspaper mogul Conrad Black's longtime business partner, has been named interim publisher of the Victoria Times Colonist, one of Canada's oldest newspapers, after its publisher resigned. Working from his Vancouver office, Radler runs the Alberta Newspaper Group, a subsidiary of Glacier Media, which bought the Times Colonist and some weeklies from Postmedia in 2011, the Globe and Mail reported. Radler testified against Black in 2007 in a U.S. mail fraud case related to their management of the Hollinger newspaper chain. In exchange, Radler served 10 months in a Canadian jail. Black served 42 months in U.S. jails before his release last year.

Leader Backs Israel

LONDON — Ed Miliband, the Jewish leader of Britain's opposition Labour Party, has pledged to oppose boycotts of Israel and to protect Jewish customs, including circumcision and kashrut. Speaking March 7 at an event organized by Britain's main Jewish umbrella group, Miliband, a self-described socialist and son of a famed Marxist academic, warned of the need to be "ever-vigilant" against antisemitism and said, "Ways of life must be preserved," the Jewish Chronicle reported. He also condemned the delegitimization of Israel, adding that boycotts are "totally wrong." But he also said people must "understand the anger and dismay about settlements." When asked if he was a Zionist, he answered: "Yes, I am a supporter of Israel," the Daily Telegraph reported.

Group Not Admitted

LONDON — Britain's Zionist Federation (ZF) defended its decision not to admit a dovish group that defines itself as pro-Israel but opposes Israeli settlements. The umbrella group's president, Paul Charney, said Yachad was rejected by "a clear majority" of the ZF's national council because it isn't vocal enough in support of Israel. Yachad director Hannah Weisfeld said the ZF was being exclusionary. "We are a pro-Israel organization right at the heart of the Anglo-Jewish community," she told the Jewish Chronicle. Charney said that though Yachad signed the platform of the World Zionist Organization, which the Zionist Federation is part of, "in practice, they do not comply with it."Yachad can reapply in six months.

Baird Warns Palestinian Against ICC Move

WASHINGTON — Canada will consider "consequences" against the Palestinian Authority if it uses its new non-member observer state status at the UN to bring Israel before the International Criminal Court, Foreign Minister John Baird told the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) conference in Washington, D.C., last week.

John Baird

"Palestine" gained elevated status at the UN last fall. Canada, the United States, Israel and a handful of other nations voted against the upgrade.

Speaking March 3 to the pro-Israel conference, Baird said Canada remains committed to a Palestinian state, but it must come about by direct talks and not unilateral actions at the UN or elsewhere.

"We were very clear from the outset that further actions, like we've seen at UNESCO, like we've seen at the United Nations, particularly at the International Criminal Court, will be ones which… will not go unnoticed and will have certainly consequences in… relations with the Palestinian authority," he said.

Baird's comments came as Canada's three-year, $300-million economic aid package to the PA is scheduled to expire at the end of this month. A spokesperson for the Canadian International Development Agency, which oversees most of the money, told The CJN Ottawa is reviewing the funding as part of normal procedure.

Responding to Baird's comments, senior PA official Saeb Erekat told China's Xinhua News Agency that the Palestinians "do not know why Canada is showing all this hostility against us. Those who fear international courts must force Israel to stop its crimes."

The PA has said it plans to take Israel to the ICC over settlement building in the occupied territories.

Divestment Bid Fails

SAN FRANCISCO — Stanford University's student senate rejected a bill calling for selective divestment from Israel. The Associated Students of Stanford University Undergraduate Senate rejected the proposal, put forth by Students for Palestinian Equal Rights (SPER). The bill originally would have committed the Senate to urge the university's board of trustees to reconsider endowment investments in eight companies, including Caterpillar, Lockheed Martin and Motorola. The March 5 vote centred on a revised version that pared the list to two. The failure of the SPER bill capped off several weeks of contentious debate on campus. SPER co-president Omar Shakir, a law student, had alleged the companies listed in the proposal profit from Israel's control of the West Bank and "commit human rights abuses and violations of international law." Groups on both sides received support from prominent outside voices. On SPER's side were a pair of Nobel Peace Prize laureates, Northern Irish peace activist Mairead Maguire and Archbishop Desmond Tutu of South Africa. Author Alice Walker had also backed the measure. The Stanford Israel Alliance (SIA) opposed the bill and was backed by U.S. House Majority Leader Eric Cantor and U.S. Congressman Charles Rangel.

Postal union slammed for anti-Israel newsletter

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The Canadian Union of Postal Workers (CUPW) has drawn its sights on Israel once again, with the union's The Rose newsletter accusing Canada of "perpetuating war crimes" by supporting the Jewish state.

Jewish organizations, MPs and postal workers slammed the union, accusing it of overstepping its mandate and of misusing workers' funds.

MPs' rebukes were non-partisan: Conservative MP Mark Adler strongly condemned CUPW, saying, "It is shameful that CUPW is abusing hard-working union members' money by using it to fund hate. Spreading rhetoric about Israel has nothing to do with the mandate of the union and does nothing to help Canadian postal workers."

Liberal party interim leader Bob Rae said, "I continue to be astonished by the extent to which ideas which should be on the 'loony tunes' margins of politics have now been adopted by a union which represents thousands of its members."

Bob Rae

NDP MP Peter Stoffer also slammed CUPW's "war crimes" reference, saying, "I think their position would be very wrong on that and I would ask them to carefully reflect upon that."

The anti-Israel comments were part of the March 2013 edition of The Rose. Timed to coincide with International Women's Day, the newsletter featured a page titled "Reflections from Palestine," a report by Ruth Breen, a member of CUPW's Fredericton local who visited "Palestine" last year. The Atlantic Region's Solidarity Fund paid for her trip.

Breen describes hardships faced by several Palestinian women and concludes, "The lives of these women should motivate us. Our country plays a key part in perpetuation war crimes and we can use our voice to oppose it. Canada is allowing Israel to terrorize occupied people, breach international law, normalize home demolitions, build prison-style walls and checkpoints, and steal resources."

Last year, CUPW was denied public funds after five members attended an anti-Israel forum in Brazil that called for the release of Ahmad Saadat from an Israeli jail.

Saadat was sentenced in 2008 to 30 years in prison for heading the left-wing terrorist Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP) and for orchestrating the 2001 assassination of Israeli tourism minister Rehavam Zeevi.

In 2008, CUPW passed a resolution supporting the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement (BDS). It has also supported a Canadian ship that attempted to run the blockade of Gaza, and it has mused about refusing to deliver mail to Israel.

Last week, after the union came under fire for the Rose article, CUPW issued a news release saying, "we want to pressure the Israeli government to respect international law in order to create a lasting and just peace. This position reflects the democratic will of CUPW's membership and the union remains committed to it."

To sigh, cry or find strength

From the editor's desk...

Jews who are partners with God in ensuring the eternity of the faith and the people must convey the importance of that partnership to their children. And we should do so for positive reasons, for the sake of the life-sustaining embrace of the intrinsic, shining beauty of the religion.

Sometimes however, we do so for negative reasons, i.e., not to let the enemies of the Jews have the last say.

This is unavoidable given the history of the Jewish People and the increasing conflation in so many places of antisemitism with anti-Israelism as a vehicle for their anti-Jewish attitudes.

And so, in the poignant words of the late scholar, philosopher, theologian Emil Fackenheim we embrace Judaism to avoid granting Hitler "a posthumous victory." Thus, ever since the middle of the last century at least, we do not remain quiet in the face of efforts by others to defame or harm the Jewish People.

The ubiquity throughout the Jewish world of communal organizations and agencies that call out the antisemites for their antisemitism is eloquent proof of this fact.

It is in this context, therefore, that I note a number of news items from Europe last week that evoked a sigh of deep exasperation, anger, possibility and perhaps even optimism.

The Times of Israel reported that according to a survey conducted by Market Institut on behalf of the Austrian newspaper, Der Standard, over 40 per cent of Austrians think life under Hitler was "not all bad."

In a survey of 502 individuals, the poll found that 42 per cent believed that "not everything was bad under [Adolf] Hitler."

The survey asked a number of other related questions, but for our purposes, this one response calls attention to itself like an incision hemorrhaging blood onto a white sheet.

If "not everything was bad," then some things must have been good. But for the millions of untermenschen in the Third Reich – especially but not exclusively, the Jews – whom the Nazis sought to annihilate, pray tell, what part of their lives could have been good under Adolf Hitler?

Not surprisingly, the survey also found that 61 per cent of respondents, mostly the same people who said life under Hitler had some good aspects, would be happy with a strong-armed leader who did not have to contend with rival lawmakers or elections.

The JTA reported that the municipal government of the Paris suburb, Bezons, recently bestowed the special distinction of honorary resident upon the convicted murderer of Rehavam Ze'evi, the minister of tourism in the government of Israel.

In a unanimous vote, that Bezons Mayor Dominique Lesparre called "a strong political act," the Bezons councillors last month conferred the honorific upon Majdi Al-Rimawi for "defending his city and its inhabitants, calling for the application of international law for the establishment of Palestine in the 1967 borders as recognized by the United Nations and Jerusalem as its capital."

The councillors did not care – if they knew at all – that Rimawi was convicted in 2008 for the 2001 murder of Ze'evi in Jerusalem. Rimawi was one of four shooters who waited for Ze'evi, Israel's minister of tourism, outside a hotel in Jerusalem and cut him down in cold blood.

Both news items set one's teeth on edge.

In both cases, ignorance rules. And where ignorance rules, danger lurks.

Societies indifferent to the veneration of such gross distortion of truth imperil themselves. History is rich with examples, in every century, of societies that were poisoned and ultimately convulsed by the ingestion of this uniquely pernicious toxin.

In contrast however, as a countervailing positive force against the ingestion of poisoned seeds, we have the example last week of Bulgaria's Parliament.

In a declaration adopted March 8, the 70th anniversary of the massive public protests that prevented the deportation of more than 48,000 Bulgarian Jews to Nazi death camps, the Parliament in Sofia described the rescue in 1943 as a "remarkable act of humanity demonstrating the tolerance of the Bulgarian people."

Alas, some 11,343 Jews from Macedonia and Aegean Thrace, territories then administered by Bulgarian authorities, were indeed murdered by the Nazis and their confederates. But Bulgaria, though an ally of Nazi Germany, was the only eastern European country that actively saved its Jews from the Holocaust.

At a special ceremony in Brussels marking the anniversary, Bulgarian President Rosen Plevneliev said his country would not recoil from the truth or cower in the face of terror.

He was, of course, referring to his country's plea to the European Union to brand Hezbollah a terrorist organization for having arranged the slaughter of five Israelis and one Bulgarian last summer.

Where knowledge rules, danger has much less room to manoeuvre.

CANADA CHAIRS HOLOCAUST AGENCY

Canada took over the 2013-2014 chairmanship of the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance (IHRA) from Belgium in a ceremony last week in Berlin. The alliance is an intergovernmental body comprising government officials and experts from 31 countries devoted to "fostering and promoting Holocaust education, remembrance and research around the world," according to its mandate. Former Liberal MP Mario Silva will chair the alliance for Canada. The annual IHRA conference will be held in Toronto in October. Fla. police say couple was asphyxiated

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Crime Stoppers is offering a $51,000 (US) reward for information leading to an arrest for the murders of Rochelle Wise and Donny Pichosky. The Toronto snowbirds, who were found dead in their Hallandale Beach condominium townhouse Jan. 10, died of asphyxiation, Hallandale Beach police revealed at a press conference March 5.

Hallandale Beach police chief Dwayne Flournoy told reporters there were at least two perpetrators, and police have "no reason to believe the people responsible were known to [the couple]."

Flournoy would not comment on the gender of the perpetrators, nor on their motive or whether they took anything from the couple's home.

Wise, 66, was a retired preschool administrator at Bialik Hebrew Day School, and a former director of Crestwood Valley Day Camp. Pichosky, her husband of four years, was a retired businessman who volunteered with seniors at Baycrest. The couple belonged to Shaarei Shomayim Congregation in Toronto.

Flournoy said police are still hoping to identify a woman seen on a neighbour's security surveillance video Jan. 9. She may be a witness and not even know it, he said. "She may have seen a car… It's someone we need to identify."

He appealed to anyone who knows "any bit of information" as well as to one of the perpetrators who may be "less culpable" than the other or others.

"Your freedom is short-lived, but your incarceration may be diminished if you're the one that comes forward and tells us what happened," he said.

He expressed confidence that the murder would be solved. "It may not be tomorrow, it may not be in a month… I may be sitting home retired in 10, 15, 20 years, but this case is going to be solved, trust me."

One of the reasons police did not initially release many details, he said, was because of the "volumes" of evidence.

"We're still in the early process of going through the evidence. The lab has placed us on high priority… We just need that one piece to the puzzle, so we can fill it all in."

A January visit to Toronto by Flournoy and other members of his team helped them develop and test theories, he said.

Wise's son Jamie, speaking at the press conference, likewise expressed his confidence in the chief and his team.

Pichosky and Wise spent the morning of Jan. 9 at synagogue, then headed to Walmart, and later spoke to a family member on FaceTime.

A neighbour became concerned when the couple didn't show up for a planned lunch and failed to answer repeated phone calls.

Flournoy said the murder angers him. Wise and Pichosky "have no enemies. They were nice people. They were enjoying their retirement, their new marriage. They went to shows, went out to eat, they went to temple, they loved their grandkids."

He added it was "almost laughable" that one of the tips had to do with a "windfall" at the casino. The only reason Pichosky went to the casino is because he loved to take his grandchildren to the ice cream parlour there, Flournoy said.

Jamie Wise told reporters that his mother and Pichosky were "very caring people… She worked hard her whole life and finally found love."

The couple had met on a blind date. Pichosky, a widower, had been married to his first wife, Sandra, for 46 years. Wise was divorced.

"It's so sad on so many levels, because it's senseless. It was so the wrong time," Jamie Wise said.

"Today we're putting the pain aside, so we can appeal to everyone, if they know any bit of information that can help us solve this, then that's what today is for."

Wise's friend, Pearl Gladman, also speaking at the press conference, described Wise as the sister she never had.

She said she felt "a tremendous loss" that hurts even more because the murder happened in one of the couple's favourite places. "They loved this area a lot," she said.

Gladman said Wise had been "so happy… She always said God was good to her."

A bludgeoned country

Once a flowering, prosperous community contributing in all facets to the advancement and betterment of their society, Venezuela's Jews now number fewer than 9,000. After 14 years of Hugo Chavez's populist, strongman rule in which he harassed and intimidated the 22,000-strong Jewish community, most of the Jews left. To be sure, they fled Venezuela out of fear for their economic as well as their physical wellbeing, but it was the mean-spirited, almost playful delight he took in constantly singling out the Jews that drove them from the country that had been their home.

The Anti-Defamation League's Abraham Foxman has described Chavez' approach to the country's Jews as "blatant and persistent antisemitism." A handful of examples are enough to prove the accuracy of Foxman's description.

In 2004, the police raided a Jewish school in what was described in a report out of Tel Aviv University as "perhaps the most serious incident ever to have taken place in the history of the Jewish community" in Venezuela.

In 2009, Chavez demanded of the Jewish Venezuelans that they renounce and rebuke Israel for fighting against Hamas in Gaza. Chief Rabbi Pynchas Brener told JTA "people are being taught to hate."

In the 2012 presidential campaign, state-run media urged voters to reject Chavez's opponent, Henrique Capriles Radonski, by associating him with "international Zionism" and describing him as part of the "Jewish-Zionist bourgeoisie."

Last year a report surfaced that Venezuela's intelligence service, SEBIN, has been spying on the Jewish community for years. This was happening as state-run radio regularly broadcast antisemitic messages and themes.

The anti-Jewish atmosphere had become so chokingly worrisome, that Jewish organizations in Caracas had even developed a contingent emergency plan to evacuate the country's Jews. Apparently, according to JTA, the plan has not been put away.

A society inhospitable to Jews, history has taught us, will soon be inhospitable to a great many more.

And so it is now in Venezuela. The country is a social and economic shambles, bludgeoned by the brutish application of anti-western ideology, expedience, scapegoating and rampant antisemitism.

Following the ways of every demagogue who ever bent the rules of democracy, fairness and due process toward the massive black hole of his own narcissistic, nationalistic, jingoistic, malevolent ambitions, Chavez ran roughshod over the many individuals and groups who did not fit into his grand plan for his country.

But the grand planner died March 5 at the age of 58.

We hope his country will heal from the wounds he slashed into its body politic.

25 years ago in The CJN

Speaking to a delegation of presidents of major Jewish organizations, Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Shamir called for a clamp-down on Diaspora Jewish criticism of Israel's handling of the ongoing unrest in the West Bank and Gaza, as well as on news coverage of the situation there.

Jewish education in Ottawa

I read with great interest your editorial on the costs of Jewish education, ("Summit on Education," Feb. 12). The silence on this topic has been particularly deafening in Ottawa, where our Jewish community day school recently announced significant changes to its tuition and financial model. The proposed tuition model will increase the tuition by 15 to 22 per cent for middle-income families of $150,000 to $250,000 gross income.

Climbing tuition fees are driving out families headed by professionals who want their children to attend day school. It makes sense economically (not necessarily philosophically) to spread the distribution of tuition assistance to middle-income households rather than focusing solely on full funding at the lower end of the income spectrum – that is, when you subsidize the cost by a few thousand dollars per, let's say, 10 families in the middle rather than full scholarships for one or two families.

We know that gross household income is not a good measure of affordability of private school. Many families obtain assistance or other sources of income not necessarily identified on their tax return. As well, there are families that might have expenditures beyond their control, such as daycare or after-school care costs.

In Ottawa, our community day school enrolment has fallen by 39 per cent in the last five years. We know from 2001 census information that the majority of Jewish households in Canada represented families of "middle" income – those between $150,000 and $250,000 (old information but incomes in general in Canada have changed very little since 2001). In a smaller Jewish centre such as Ottawa, there is little room for alienating this middle class of parents.

If a community is dedicated to making Jewish day schools accessible to as many families as possible, then providing assistance to all but the wealthiest families might achieve this goal. On the other hand, if the goal is to make schools that are financially self-sustainable by charging the real costs of the school and limiting subsidies to those defined as "in need," the community must recognize that the schools will suffer as middle-income families will not be able to attend. In Ottawa, the debate about the future of Jewish education is bubbling to the surface. Significant change will happen, and we are most ready to be a part of a large strategy or summit.

Kwinter voted against his party

Monte Kwinter, while a minster in former Ontario premier's Dalton McGuinty's first government, did vote against his own government's rescinding of the Equity in Education Tax Credit shortly after the 2003 provincial election ("Kwinter and Jewish education," letter, Feb. 28). This deserves special notice, because minsters are expected to support all government legislation, and Kwinter did take the bold step opposing this legislation. Kwinter suffered retribution for this, because he was ultimately shuffled out of cabinet. While I am a diehard conservative and a supporter of the Progressive Conservative Party of Ontario, we must keep to the facts when dealing with this issue. It was the mean-spirited McGuinty who sold out the soul of the Ontario Liberal Party to engage the votes of schoolteachers in attempting to win the election. And it was the mean-spiritedness of McGuinty that ultimately threw Kwinter under the bus by removing him from cabinet.

Palliative care

The three-part series on palliative care, published on Feb. 28, March 7 and in today's CJN, indicates that it is based on Jewish values. But is it based on Jewish law? I understand and appreciate the need for palliative care, but does this type of patient intervention take into account halachic restrictions against the removal of life support, the deprivation of oxygenation and the denial of hydration and nutrition? This is a complicated area of Jewish law and practice that requires the utilization of halachic authorities to work in conjunction with palliative specialists.

Pesach Jews vs. Purim Jews: the agony of our dilemma

Yossi Klein Halevi

As I travelled through North American Jewish communities on a lecture tour about Israeli society in the aftermath of the elections, I sometimes felt as though I was in a time warp.

Visiting an Orthodox community, I may find myself back in the 1970s and 1980s, before the first intifadah convinced a majority of Israelis that the occupation is a mortal threat to the Jewish state; right-wing North American Jews will insist instead, that Israel must continue building settlements and creating "facts" on the ground. And when I visit a liberal community, I may find myself back in the 1990s, before the second intifadah convinced that same majority of Israelis that a one-way peace process is likewise a mortal threat to the Jewish state; left-wing North American Jews will insist instead, that a peace agreement is always within reach and just a matter of Israeli will.

And so I try to explain that most Israelis have internalized the left-right divide and agree with the left's anxiety over the occupation and with the right's anxiety over a delusional peace. For most Israelis, I note, a Palestinian state is an existential necessity that would save us from the demographic threat to Israel as a Jewish and democratic state – and also an existential threat that could turn greater Tel Aviv into the next Sderot, the Israeli town near Gaza that has absorbed thousands of rocket attacks in the last decade.

Most polls confirm the centrist persona of the Israeli majority. Asked whether they support a two-state solution, upward of 70 per cent of Israelis respond affirmatively. Asked whether a two-state solution would bring peace, upward of 80 per cent say no. In other words: Israelis want to be doves, but reality forces them to be hawks.

The rise of Yair Lapid and his Yesh Atid party – appearing from nowhere to become the second-largest party in the Knesset – is only the latest example of the longing of many Israelis for a centrist politics that embodies the realism of the left about the occupation and of the right about the peace process.

What most depresses me is that this insight – by now commonplace in Israeli discourse – comes as a revelation to many North American Jews. The two most important Jewish communities in the world aren't communicating.

During the recent elections, a puzzled American Jewish journalist asked me: "Why aren't Israelis debating the collapse of the peace process?" My response was: "Most of us have already resolved the issue. If there were a credible partner able to contain Hamas and address our red-line issues, like the right of return, we would make the necessary territorial concessions. In the absence of a credible peace partner, we're moving on with our lives."

North American Jews today are divided over two anxieties relating to Israel's future. Like Israelis, many North American Jews are keenly aware of the external dangers facing the Jewish state. In a Middle East that is imploding and turning increasingly fundamentalist, and with Iran approaching the nuclear threshold, there is a whiff of May 1967, the anxious weeks before the Six Day War, when threat pressed against Israel's borders and war seemed imminent.

For many liberal North American Jews, though, the primary focus of their Israel anxiety is on internal issues: the fraying of democracy, the seemingly irreversible occupation and the receding promise of peace.

A healthy people knows how to set its priorities of anxiety. It knows how to focus first on imminent threat. Yet a healthy people also knows that it cannot afford to allow even immediate threat to serve as pretext for denying long-term dangers.

Jewish history speaks to our generation in the voice of two biblical commands to remember. The first voice commands us to remember that we were strangers in the land of Egypt, and the message of that command is: "Don't be brutal." The second voice commands us to remember how the tribe of Amalek attacked us without provocation while we were wandering in the desert, and the message of that command is: "Don't be naive."

The first command is the voice of Passover, of liberation; the second is the voice of Purim, commemorating our victory over the genocidal threat of Haman, a descendant of Amalek.

"Passover Jews" are motivated by empathy with the oppressed; "Purim Jews" are motivated by alertness to threat.

Both are essential; one without the other creates an unbalanced Jewish personality, a distortion of Jewish history and values.

One reason the Palestinian issue is so wrenching for Jews is that it is the point on which the two commands of our history converge: the stranger in our midst is represented by a national movement that wants to usurp us.

And so a starting point of a healthy North American Jewish conversation on Israel would be acknowledging the agony of our dilemma.

Yossi Klein Halevi

Imagine an Orthodox rabbi, a supporter of the settlers in Hebron, delivering this sermon to his congregation: "My friends, our community has sinned against Israel. For all our devotion to the Jewish state and our concern for its survival, we have failed to acknowledge the consequences to Israel's soul of occupying another people against its will."

Now imagine a liberal rabbi, a supporter of J Street, telling his congregation: "My friends, our community has sinned against Israel. For all our devotion to the Jewish state and our concern for its democratic values, we have failed to acknowledge the urgency of existential threat once again facing our people."

When North American Jews internalize or at least acknowledge each other's anxieties, the shrillness of much of the North American Jewish debate over Israel will give way to a more nuanced conversation.

The good news is that parts of the Jewish community have begun that process. Jews from left and right are quietly meeting across the country, trying to nurture a civil conversation on Israel.

But civility is only the starting point. The goal is to create multi-dimensional Jews, capable of holding more than one insight about Israeli reality. It is to translate the centrist Israeli ambivalence into American Jewish discourse.

Israel criticizes Dutch for labelling West Bank products

JNS.org

JERUSALEM — Israel last Thursday sharply condemned an initiative in the Netherlands directing businesses to label products originating in the West Bank, eastern Jerusalem and the Golan Heights as separate from those produced in Israel.

Foreign Ministry spokesperson Yigal Palmor, according to Israel Hayom, said, "If the Europeans claim that labelling products made in the settlements is intended only to inform the consumer that the product comes from a disputed area, they should also be consistent and mark any product from disputed territories in Europe and around the world. But if the move denigrates Israel, and only Israel, it is clearly a manifestation of blatant discrimination and thus inherently wrong."

Interior Minister Eli Yishai also responded to the Dutch government initiative on Thursday, saying, "Products from the settlements beyond the Green Line [Israel's pre-1967 borders], just like those made within the Green Line, are proud blue and white products. The State of Israel will stand as one entity against any attempt to boycott its products."

Last Wednesday, the Dutch Ministry of Economic Affairs issued a directive to all retail chains in the country, instructing them to assist consumers in making fully knowledgeable decisions in stores by labelling products from Jewish communities beyond the 1967 Green Line differently than products from the rest of Israel.

The directive calls for the labelling of fresh products not as made in Israel, but as made in "Israeli settlements in the Golan Heights, east Jerusalem, the West Bank or in Palestinian territories."

Though retailers are responsible for the labelling, as opposed to importers, they will not be punished for not complying, nor is it illegal to import products from the Jewish communities in question. The move follows a Feb. 27 report written by European Union mission heads in Jerusalem and Ramallah recommending that EU countries "prevent" all financial transactions that support Israel's activities in those communities.

Holland joins other EU countries, such as Britain and Denmark, both of which also recommended such labelling to retailers. Last May, South Africa also directed retailers not to mark products made in Jewish communities beyond the Green Line with the same label as those made in the rest of Israel.

Facelessness and faces in the Shoah

As if we need reminding, the headline in the New York Times read, "The Holocaust Just Got More Shocking." The story reported on the multi-volume encyclopedia in production by the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum on ghettos, labour and concentration camps, and killing centres during the Nazi genocide. With several volumes already published and more to come, the research is staggering: approximately 42,000 sites, more vast than anyone had imagined.

The Times report, quickly picked up by other publications, reminds us that we still don't know all that there is to know about the Holocaust. This was true 30 years ago, when my colleague at the Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies at York University, Irving Abella, together with Harold Troper of the University of Toronto, published None is Too Many, exposing Canada's shameful wartime record. It's still true today, even with survivors speaking out, writing memoirs, and recording testimonies, and with many researchers making the study of the Shoah their life's work.

No matter how much we learn, we must retain the capacity to be shocked by the Holocaust. Amid the numbers, we must keep in mind the human beings caught up in the web of the Nazi genocide. Princeton University historian and sociologist Jan Gross focused on both the shock and the human question when he visited our campus recently and spoke to an audience of approximately 250 about his research. A specialist in Polish-Jewish relations during and after the war years, Gross discussed the physical torture inflicted on Jews by their neighbours – by people they knew from school, work and local events – and the exploitation for profit of the Jews' terrible circumstance.

Because the victims of localized torture were murdered, accounts are drawn largely from participants and a few eyewitnesses. And because the story has not been told in the voice of its Jewish victims, Gross observed, the victims remain "faceless."

Yet whenever they were able, the Jews of Europe insisted on a voice, a name, a face. We see this in the countless diaries that were kept, at great effort and personal risk, in ghettos and in hiding, even in labour camps. And we see the faces, quite literally, in a special group of photographs that survived the war.

Gross' talk at York marked the opening of a remarkable photography exhibition, The Face of the Ghetto: Pictures by Jewish Photographers from the Lodz Ghetto 1940-1944, now on display until March 17 at Osgoode Hall Law School at York University. Hosted by the Koschitzky Centre and Osgoode Hall Law School, and co-sponsored by the Azrieli Foundation and the Mark and Gail Appel Program in Holocaust and Antiracism Education, with support from the consulates of Germany and Poland, the exhibition features approximately 50 large-scale pictures taken by photographers in the Lodz (or Litzmannstadt) Ghetto between 1940 and 1944. Assembled by the Topography of Terror Foundation in Berlin, and shown there and at the United Nations in New York, the exhibition was brought to York for its only showing in Canada.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

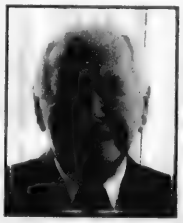
The Jews in the Lodz Ghetto were prohibited from possessing cameras. However, the German authorities issued cameras to a small number of Jewish photographers and commissioned them to document the efficiency of the ghetto factories and other sites of slave labour. At their own initiative and at risk to their own lives, the photographers took thousands of pictures of Jewish life in the ghetto.

They depict not only – not primarily – atrocity and suffering, but Jewish life, dignity and spirit. Quite literally, they show the faces of the people in the ghetto, and, metaphorically, their humanness – precisely what was denied by perpetrators and their collaborators. Unlike photographs taken by Nazi photographers, these were taken by photographers who shared the fate of the people they photographed. They reflect a deep empathy and a sense of the efforts of the ghetto inhabitants to maintain their dignity and culture in face of an unspeakably harsh and increasingly helpless situation.

It is fitting to host this exhibition in Osgoode Law School, as a reminder of the sanctioned lawlessness and also the rule of perverse law under National Socialism in Germany. We are privileged to share it with the community.

Truth, strength and love: remembering David Hartman

In a lecture in Jerusalem some four years ago, Rabbi David Hartman, who died last month, sounded uncharacteristically despondent. I decided not to argue with him in public, but wrote him a letter. Part of its concluding paragraph reads: "Though the Hartman line hasn't conquered the world, or even Israel, its influence has been enormous. You have helped your generation of rabbis and the next to think outside the denominational box. I am always happy to describe you as the father of contemporary post-denominational Judaism."



Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

At that time, one of his disciples had become the president of the (Reform) Central Conference of American Rabbis. Another, who spoke at the funeral that was attended by hundreds of people – from black hats to bare heads – is Rabbi Rick Jacobs, the president of the Union for Reform Judaism. He said that he would have never become who he is today without the inspiration and mentoring he had received from Rabbi Hartman.

Though not a Reform Jew by any stretch of the imagination, Rabbi Hartman was a proud recipient of an honorary doctorate from Hebrew Union College, where most Reform rabbis in the world are trained. Many of its graduates have been touched by his teachings.

Rabbi David Hartman was also Prof. David Hartman, one of the most significant thinkers in contemporary Judaism. His innovative writings that sought to reflect the new reality of Jewish sovereignty in Israel will influence generations to come. The institute he created and named after his late father, Shalom, now in the capable hands of his son Rabbi Donniel Hartman, has become a centre for new and creative thinking in contemporary Judaism.

In his eulogy, Prof. Israel Knohl, distinguished Bible scholar and one of the senior fellows of the institute, illustrated Rabbi David Hartman's greatness by showing how he constantly modified his thinking in the light of new realities, insights and experiences. As an example, he reported that only recently, Rabbi Hartman declared that he had erred in understating the true significance and impact of the Holocaust for contemporary Jewish life and thought.

The two most distinguished Jewish philosophers to make aliyah from Canada were Rabbi Hartman, who left his thriving congregation in Montreal in the 1970s, and the late Prof. Emil Fackenheim, the world-famous thinker, who came a decade later when he retired from the University of Toronto. They were neighbours in Jerusalem, yet could have inhabited different planets. What divided them was their understanding of the Holocaust. Should they now meet in the next world, they'll at last be at one.

The many moving words spoken at the funeral by his children and colleagues praised Rabbi Hartman not only as teacher and philosopher, but also as a warm and complex human being. Knohl used three Hebrew words to describe him, each beginning with the letter aleph, albeit vocalized differently: emet (truth), ometz (strength) and ahavah (love).

Rabbi David Hartman was the quintessential seeker of truth, always eager to learn from everybody, yet arguing with all, including the teachers he admired and who had inspired him, notably Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik.

Rabbi Hartman possessed great strength and determination, reflected in the magnificent institution he built and the impact it continues to have on countless women and men across the entire spectrum of Jewish life, both in Israel and, particularly, abroad. He was a courageous man whose commitment to truth made all whose lives he touched to admire and respect him.

But above all, Rabbi David Hartman was a man who loved not only his family, as nobly expressed by three of his five children who spoke at the funeral, but also Torah in all its manifestations and the Jewish People in all its diversity. That was the secret of his charisma. He attracted disciples by the strength of his personality no less than through the power of his writings.

Rabbi Hartman never ceased to struggle with God and tradition: his latest book is called, The God Who Hates Lies. But he never abandoned either. He remained a passionately faithful and consistently observant Jew to his last day. He taught his students and his readers how never to compromise with the quest for truth and, at the same time, never to give up on the strength that Judaism bestows on those who practise it.

Obama faces daunting tasks in Israel

On his first trip abroad since his re-election last November, U.S. President Barack Obama is due to visit Israel, as well as Jordan and the Palestinian territories in the West Bank, next week.

Dan Shapiro, the American ambassador in Tel Aviv, has characterized the trip as an opportunity to deepen mutual understanding.

Obama, he said in a preview, intends to showcase "the depth, breadth and quality" of the United States' strategic partnership with Israel and to discuss issues of common importance ranging from Iran's budding nuclear program to the breakdown of peace negotiations between Israel and the Palestinian Authority. But on a more immediate level, the objective of Obama's visit, from March 20 to 22, is to try to smooth over the rough edges of his often contentious personal relationship with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Aaron David Miller, a former U.S. diplomat who served under six secretaries of state in both Democratic and Republican administrations, has described the dynamics of their relationship as "the most dysfunctional" ever between an American president and an Israeli prime minister. They not only "mistrust one another" but exhibit "very little confidence" in each other, he noted.

In Miller's view, their strained relationship is unique in the annals of America's alliance with Israel because it has been left to fester for so long. He points out that previous American and Israeli leaders had sharp disagreements, citing Jimmy Carter and Menachem Begin in the 1980s and George H.W. Bush and Yitzhak Shamir in the 1990s. But they managed to bury their differences in common causes.

Carter and Begin worked together, if not always harmoniously, to ensure that Israel and Egypt signed a peace treaty in 1979. Bush and Shamir co-operated in the 1991 Gulf War against Iraq.

But when it comes to Obama and Netanyahu, not even a shared antipathy to Iran's nuclear ambitions has diminished the friction. Nor can Obama forget that Netanyahu appeared to tilt toward Mitt Romney, the Republican Party candidate, in the last presidential election.

Blogging on the Bloomberg website, Jeffery Goldberg, a U.S. writer close to Obama, drew a scathing indictment of Netanyahu's policies. Writing as Obama's mouthpiece, Goldberg observed, "Iran poses a short-term threat to Israel's survival [but] Israel's own behaviour poses a long-term one."

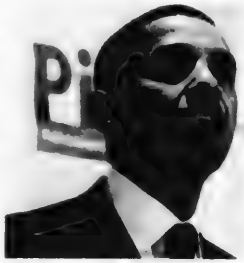
According to Goldberg, Obama – who last visited Israel in 2008 when he was a presidential candidate – regards Netanyahu as "a political coward" who's unwilling "to lead or spend political capital" to advance talks with the Palestinians.

Obama, he adds, is convinced that Netanyahu is "so captive to the settler lobby, and so uninterested in making anything more than the slightest conciliatory gesture toward Palestinian moderates, that an investment of presidential interest in the peace process wouldn't be a wise use of his time."

Goldberg goes on to say that Obama believes that "Israel's settlement policies are foreclosing on the possibility of a two-state solution," which, he thinks, represents "the best chance of preserving [Israel] as "a Jewish-majority democracy." Quoting Obama on the eve of its Jan. 22 general election, Goldberg wrote, "Israel doesn't know what its own best interests are."

In a withering riposte, Netanyahu declared that "only Israeli citizens will be the ones who determine who faithfully represents the vital interests of Israel."

Despite the harsh tone of Obama's critique, Obama, in his recent State of the Union speech, reaffirmed that the United States "will stand steadfast with Israel in pursuit of security and a lasting peace." Leon Panetta, the outgoing U.S. secretary of defence, was just as emphatic, saying that Washington's relationship with Jerusalem is "stronger than any time in history" and grounded in shared values and an "iron-clad commitment" to Israel's existence.



U.S. President Barack Obama

Chuck Hagel, Panetta's successor, was criticized for being soft on Iran and hard on Israel. He has since apologized for his "very poor choice of words" in having referred to a "Jewish lobby" in the United States, pledged to maintain Israel's military superiority and promised to support economic sanctions against Iran.

The new American secretary of state, John Kerry, who will accompany Obama to Israel, has made it clear that the president is going to Jerusalem "to listen" rather than to present a concrete proposal to thaw out the frozen Israeli-Palestinian peace process.

Early in his presidency, Obama called for a complete settlement freeze and denounced settlements as "illegitimate." Subsequently, he called for a peace accord based on an Israeli withdrawal to the pre-1967 lines and mutual Israeli and Palestinian land swaps.

Netanyahu, a supporter of the settlement movement, rejected Obama's plan and continues to build in eastern Jerusalem and expand existing settlements in the West Bank.

In the face of Israel's moves, the Obama administration has stood its ground. "We... oppose unilateral actions on the Israeli side... as they complicate efforts to resume direct, bilateral negotiations and risk prejudging the outcome of those negotiations," the U.S. ambassador to Israel said recently, just weeks before Obama appointed Philip Gordon, a seasoned diplomat, as his new co-ordinator for Middle East affairs.

With respect to Iran, Obama will probably bring a mixed message with him when he arrives in Israel. On the one hand, as Kerry said in February, the United States categorically rejects a nuclear-armed Iran and has warned that "the window for a diplomatic solution cannot remain open forever." But on the other hand, Washington is opposed to a unilateral Israeli strike on Iran.

Last month, in the wake of a comment by Netanyahu setting mid-2013 as a "red line" for halting Iranian uranium enrichment, two top U.S. officials reassured Israel of the Obama administration's determination to prevent Iran from becoming an atomic power.

Rose Gottemoeller, the acting undersecretary of state for arms control and international security, and Wendy Sherman, the undersecretary of state for political affairs and the chief U.S. negotiator in world power talks with Iran, both reiterated Washington's policy on this key issue in visits to Jerusalem.

After hearing an update from Sherman on the latest round of talks, held in Almaty, Kazakhstan, Israeli President Shimon Peres expressed satisfaction that the United States would do whatever possible to stop Iran from developing nuclear weapons. Last week, touching on this theme, U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden said that the United States is "not bluffing" in its resolve to prevent Iran from joining the nuclear club.

With a civil war raging in Syria and spilling into adjacent countries, Syria will be another topic Obama and Netanyahu will surely address. Israel and the United States concur that President Bashar Assad must go and that Syrian chemical weapons should not fall into the wrong hands, namely Hezbollah.

Netanyahu will ask Obama to release convicted spy Jonathan Pollard, who has served 28 years of a life sentence for espionage. But Pollard is unlikely to be released, at least within the foreseeable future.

Toronto man arrested after JCC threatened

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Toronto police charged a man with threatening death and mischief against the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre last week, and the Toronto Police Service hate crimes unit is also investigating an envelope containing a letter and a swastika that was sent to Associated Hebrew Schools the same day as the threat against the JCC.

Constable Victor Kwong told The CJN that police were called at 4:15 p.m. on March 5, after the MNJCC received "a succession of e-mails.

"We went on the scene, and it was determined that there were no immediate threats, meaning there was no bomb," Kwong said.

Harold Lee, 36, is scheduled to appear in court in Old City Hall March 12.

Ellen Cole, executive director of the MNJCC, said last week that the centre – which houses the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School in addition to fitness facilities and a variety of programs – has the "appropriate protocols and procedures in place. Everyone was out of the building in less than seven minutes... We were given the all clear, and it's business as usual."

Doron Horowitz, director of national security for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), who serves as a resource to Jewish institutions, doesn't believe the two incidents are related.

Elliott Brodkin, Associated's executive director, told parents and the school's "community" in a March 8 email that the school received a plain white envelope containing "both a suspicious piece of paper as well as a swastika." The letter arrived in the regular mail, he wrote.

"At no point was there any specific threat made against anyone at our school," he told parents.

Brodkin declined to give further details about the letter's content in an interview with The CJN.

School receives letter with swastika in unrelated incident

Horowitz called the letter received by Associated "disturbing," but doesn't think the community has cause to be concerned because of it. "At no point in time was [Associated] threatened or targeted," he said.

Horowitz, who works with Jewish schools on an ongoing basis, said he knew of no other related incidents.

Kwong also said there is "nothing to indicate the two incidents might be connected" and that the letter Associated received is being analyzed forensically.

Horowitz said CIJA will continue to provide resources to the community and liaise with law enforcement officials. "We are constantly working with [Jewish institutions] in emergency preparedness."

Police are asking anyone with information regarding the MNJCC threat to call 14 Division at 416-808-1400. Anyone with information regarding the letter to AHS can call 32 Division at 416-808-3200.

A special monthly message for the Baycrest community

Community Matters

The proud tradition of a community that dreams and builds

For many decades, Baycrest has had the privilege of building special relationships with generations of individual and family supporters.

Each represents a vital link in a chain of caring that stretches back to 1918 when a group of brave and generous women established the Jewish Old Folks Home in a small house in downtown Toronto.

Since those early days, Baycrest has grown into a uniquely comprehensive campus of care serving nearly 2,500 older adults a day.

It is the passion and commitment of our supporters that has helped build Baycrest into a vitally important community asset, always ready to care for the most vulnerable older adults among us.

We have inherited a legacy of dreaming about what might be possible and then creating it, of never settling for the status quo, and of sharing our work with all who can benefit.

As a result, Baycrest is now recognized around the world not only for innovations in seniors' health that began here, but also for research that continues to advance knowledge about how to maintain and strengthen the aging brain.

We believe Baycrest's growth and accomplishments should be a source of pride to Toronto's Jewish community, especially to the generations of families who have supported us with their donations, their time, their energy and their selfless volunteerism.

Baycrest's achievements have helped us extend our reputation for care and innovation well beyond our local community.

We embrace the moral mandate of Tikkun Olam, (תיקון עולם), "repairing a broken world," and join the long-standing tradition of all great Jewish healthcare institutions—to improve the well-being of people in their local communities as well as around the globe.

Here are just a few of our recent achievements that we are so intensely proud to share:

Exemplary care

Caring for patients, residents and families is at the heart of what we do. It was the guiding force that established our organization nearly a century ago. Recently, Baycrest was awarded "exemplary status" by Accreditation Canada, ranking us among the top performers in patient care, safety and corporate operations in the country.

The Ontario government has designated Baycrest as a long-term care "Centre for Learning, Research and Innovation." With provincial support we are testing new, cost-effective models of best practice and care delivery for older adults. The goal is to enhance the care experience for both clients and care providers in Toronto and beyond.

Research with impact

An international expert panel ranked the Rotman Research Institute at Baycrest as the "highest impact" cognitive neurosciences program in the world in the area of human memory and aging.

For example, discoveries by Baycrest scientists have helped to identify healthier diets that can reduce the risk of age-related memory decline.

They have also yielded new insights into how older adults learn and retain new information, paving the way for treatments for mild cognitive impairment. We are among the first in the world to introduce a computer model of a functioning human brain (the "virtual brain" project).

Training the next generation

We look forward to broadening the scope of Baycrest-led training for more medical students and other local and international healthcare professionals in the years to come. We are training the next generation of geriatric care professionals on a global basis in disciplines such as nursing, nutrition, pharmacy and kinesiology—to better communicate and build relationships with cognitively frail adults in hospitals and nursing homes.

Each year, more than 1,100 health care students and professionals from across North America, Western Europe, the Middle East, South America, Australia and China are trained within our campus of care.

Besides bringing a fresh source of revenue for our Toronto home campus, this sharing of knowledge and expertise exemplifies our Jewish values of helping others.

Finding new tools, new revenue sources

Baycrest has launched two exciting spin-out companies—Baycrest Global Solutions (BGS) and Cogniciti Inc.—to market our expertise in comprehensive senior care and to develop products, goods and services aimed at strengthening people's cognitive abilities throughout middle adulthood and into older age.

This is another way we are sharing our expertise with others while creating new sources of revenue for our Toronto home campus so we can continue to deliver high-quality care and programs to our Jewish elderly.

Having the support of our community has never been more critical than it is today. We are now about to unveil our most important Strategic Plan in many years—the one that will lead us to a tremendous milestone: Baycrest's 100th Anniversary in 2018. As our community continues to dream, we will continue to build.

This is the first in a planned series of columns called "Community Matters" that will appear in upcoming issues of the Canadian Jewish News so that readers can see first-hand how the legacy of dreaming becomes reality.

We look forward to sharing more details about plans, achievements, and challenges as we actively engage in co-creating with the community, and we welcome your questions and comments.

Groundbreaking for new JCC delayed

New downtown cultural centre changes plans for Bathurst site

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Plans to break ground for the new facility that's slated to replace the former Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) have been delayed again, but the building is still expected to open in 2016, community officials say.

However, the "size and scope" of the new structure, to be located at the Sherman campus on Bathurst Street between Sheppard and Finch avenues, are expected to be different from the original plans because of a recently proposed downtown Jewish cultural centre.

Ted Sokolsky

Ted Sokolsky, president and CEO of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, told The CJN that the federation is finalizing a plan to build the downtown centre, which would include a Jewish museum and gallery space for the Koffler Centre of the Arts.

Groundbreaking for the mid-town Prosserman JCC on the Bathurst site is contingent on finalizing plans for downtown, and on raising additional funds, Sokolsky said. He expects ground will be broken before the end of 2014, instead of this year, which was the previous goal.

In 2008, the federation announced that the entire project, including the new JCC, would be ready in November 2011. The BJCC was torn down in late 2009.

The federation has raised $100 million for the new campus, and still has to raise another $35 to 40 million, Sokolsky said. He believes all the funds will be raised before ground is broken, he said.

An original estimate of $150 million for the total cost of completing the campus has been revised, based on the redesign, Sokolsky clarified.

He said the new plans would cost the same as the original ones, but part of the money would be redirected downtown.

The Koffler museum and gallery were originally going to be part of the new Bathurst JCC. The Ontario Jewish Archives would remain in their current location on the Sherman campus.

Sokolsky said the federation has "an opportunity for a downtown space," but that it is too early to release details.

The location "would provide much more traffic and access to the general public, and help drive revenues a lot better," he said.

As a result, the complex of buildings on the Sherman campus could be 12,000 square feet smaller than planned. A new Leah Posluns Theatre would still be built there, as well as Koffler Centre offices and facilities.

Phase 1 of renovations on the Bathurst Street site cost $40 million, including the $10-million Donald Gales Family Pavilion, which houses a daycare, fitness facilities and classes as part of the Prosserman JCC, the entity that will include the new JCC building.

Sokolsky said the federation was looking for space farther south because of a "major expansion" of the Jewish community in that part of the city. The federation already has two venues downtown, the Miles Nadal JCC at Bloor Street and Spadina Avenue, and the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life. However, Sokolsky said, it "became clear that we need to have a greater downtown presence."

The federation began looking for a location about seven months ago, he said. "We're looking to share land with interested institutions." He is hoping to make an announcement about a downtown location before the summer, he said.

Construction for the mid-town Prosserman JCC will take place on what is now an empty field, and there will be no disruption of services for current members, Sokolsky said.

After the BJCC closed in September 2009, the Gales Pavilion opened the following month. There are almost 800 fitness members using the facility, Sokolsky said. A year ago, there were 700, about 80 more than the previous year. Before the BJCC closed, it had more than 1,200 fitness members.

Sokolsky said the Bathurst site, which includes the Lipa Green Centre, is "busier than ever." The centre houses federation offices, two youth organizations, and various agencies, and will undergo a $3-million renovation (the next phase of renovations), beginning next month.

Farther north, the federation's Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan is also growing. Its JCC, the Schwartz-Reisman Centre, which opened in fall 2012, has almost 6,000 members and its daycare centre is full, Sokolsky said. As well, plans to build a theatre on the east end of the building "are moving ahead."

Bialik Hebrew Day School will open a branch at the campus this fall.

Quadriplegic rabbi reflects on freedom at Pesach

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

For Rabbi Yehuda Simes, an Ottawa teacher and youth leader, Passover is a special time to celebrate freedom. In June 2010, everything he'd thought of as freedom vanished when his family's van rolled off the highway. His pregnant wife and seven of eight children received only minor injuries, but Rabbi Simes was paralyzed from the shoulders down.

After months of rehab, in 2011 he returned to teaching and speaking, despite a laborious daily existence and ongoing pain.

Rabbi Simes' halting, sparing words – at times in a near-whisper – held a full house rapt at a Kashruth Council of Canada (COR)-sponsored pre-Pesach community lecture at Clanton Park Synagogue on March 5.

"In an instant, my entire life, my family's life was turned upside down… In that one single instant everything completely changed.

"We like to say that all nine of our children were together," said Rabbi Simes. "My youngest child was inside my wife's womb, my oldest child was on the phone" from home, talking to his sister in the car at the time of the accident.

His youngest son was born months later,

Rabbi Yehuda Simes

in the hospital where Rabbi Simes was still a patient. His team carefully choreographed every step from ICU to labour room so that he wouldn't miss the birth. "They transferred me onto the stretcher and all of my gear was ready to go.

"As I was wheeled into the room… the baby was born, and of course, who else should get the baby? So they gave me the baby. That's how it goes… it's just a river of tears. It's not exactly the way it was done before… it's different, but the same."

That was also the day Rabbi Simes breathed for the first time without a ventilator. "I should not be here in front of you right now… according to everything they know about my kind of injury."

Rabbi Simes now appreciates every breath. "Breathing is a very big deal."

"I don't look at it as an accident at all," Rabbi Simes said. "It's a sign… it tells me I am in cherus [freedom]. It's pure freedom" to still enjoy everything he could before his injuries.

"So I don't drink in the same way I used to drink. I always have to use a straw… and that's extremely positive. Because how ever would I have thought of the great brachah of swallowing? I did it all the time."

Though the trip to speak in Toronto had been gruelling, Rabbi Simes was pleased to see old friends here. An experienced teacher, he joked with the crowd: "You're a great classroom, by the way. You're much too quiet."

Speaking before Rabbi Simes was Rabbi Dovid Heber from the Star-K kosher agency in Baltimore, who reviewed many rules of Pesach, from cleaning and koshering the home to selling chametz.

Consumers can cut high Pesach costs, Rabbi Heber said, with products that don't need a Passover hechsher, such as 100 per cent pure cocoa and frozen fruit with no additives. Unprocessed meat doesn't need a special Pesach symbol, and can be bought on sale at any time. Star-K has also recently unveiled its Star-S (Sephardi) certification, which also helps Ashkenazim who permit kitniyot for infants or sick people.

Rabbi Simes concluded by recalling the moment in the Torah reading for the seventh day of Pesach when the Jews stand at the edge of the Red Sea, yet hesitate. A midrash relates that one of the tribal princes, Nachshon, son of Aminadav, waded in first.

Rabbi Simes said the great Reb Chaim Shmulevitz (1902-1979), was puzzled: "Simple people, throughout our tear drenched history… had the strength to stand up to the challenge in front of them. So how is it that the [desert generation] were not able to have that strength, that conviction?"

The challenge, Rabbi Simes said, is usually to sanctify God's name with a courageous death, but at the Red Sea, the Jews were challenged to sanctify God's name by living – to walk through, as the verse says, "in the midst of the sea on dry land." Only Nachshon "looked it in the face… and said, 'I can do that.'

"It's much more difficult, says Reb Chaim…to live life and not to see the difference between the stormy waters and the dry land."

Christians in Holy Land face different realities

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Christians in Israel and the West Bank face radically different realities, says an Israeli analyst.

While Arab Christians in Israel want to be integrated into Israeli society, their Christian brothers in the West Bank are caught uneasily between Israel and the Palestinian Authority, Rabbi David Rosen said.

Rabbi David Rosen

He spoke March 3 at a forum co-sponsored by the Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

Rabbi Rosen, born in Britain and based in Jerusalem, is the international director of interreligious affairs for the American Jewish Committee.

From 1979 to 1985, he was chief rabbi of Ireland. In 2005, the Vatican made him a Knight of the Order of St. Gregory the Great for his contributions to promoting Catholic-Jewish reconciliation.

Speaking at College Street United Church, Rabbi Rosen said that almost 200,000 Christians live between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea.

In addition, Israel is home to some 50,000 Christians from the former Soviet Union who immigrated there with their Jewish spouses and relatives.

The Russian Orthodox Church in Israel has benefited from their presence and tries to cater to their needs, Rabbi Rosen said.

The Christian Arab community in Israel is growing despite suffering from a measure of prejudice.

Christian high school students outpace their Muslim and Jewish counterparts in test results and graduation rates, he added.

Israeli Christians also play a significant role in interfaith dialogue.

By contrast, Christians living under the administration of the Palestinian Authority are in a state of numerical decline.

Since they're disproportionately involved in the tourist trade, they're directly affected by the political situation in the West Bank, Rabbi Rosen said.

The second Palestinian uprising, which erupted in 2000, had a negative impact on their livelihood, he pointed out.

Christians in the West Bank also have been affected by the route of Israel's security barrier, which has divided families.

Christianity is historically rooted in the Holy Land, and Christians there are blessed with an enormously rich heritage, Rabbi Rosen pointed out.

But Christians, divided into various sects, squabble endlessly among themselves and have a long history of trying to bring "truth" to the Holy Land.

During a question-and-answer period, Rabbi Rosen was asked about Israeli settlements in the West Bank.

He said they "complicate" efforts by the Palestinian Authority to win statehood.

Quoting the late Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, Rabbi Rosen advised Israel to take "responsible and calculated risks" to advance the currently stalled peace process.

Welcoming Shabbat

Compiled by CJN Staff

About 650 people, or 150 families, gathered at three Toronto-area synagogues for the second annual Family Shabbat Dinner organized by the National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) and Torah High on March 1.

Some 350 welcomed Shabbat at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto (BAYT) in Thornhill, 240 participated at Torath Emeth (Viewmount), and more than 50 were at Kehilat Shaarei Torah.

Participating Torah High and NCSY teens' families were paired with families from the hosting congregations where introductory Shabbat remarks were followed by dinner and singing in a relaxed atmosphere. Last year, friendships were established and maintained, aimed at enhancing the educational experience and building Jewish unity. Many such relationships were begun again this year.

"Torah High and NCSY Canada took Shabbat to the next level," Rabbi Glenn Black, chief executive officer of Torah High and NCSY Canada, said. "The Jewish values and traditions we teach in the classroom and through our programs are magnified a hundredfold by inspired and committed parents and families. These Jewish teens will be our community's leaders in the future. We need to engage and support them and their families today."

Last year, the inaugural event attracted 250 to the BAYT. Organizers hope to expand the program to five synagogues and 1,000 people next year. The event was sponsored by the Cherniak and Silverstein families.

The Face of the Ghetto: Pictures by Jewish Photographers from the Lodz Ghetto, 1940 to 1944

February 24-March 17, 2013

The Law Library, Osgoode Hall Law School of York University
Hours: Monday—Thursday 8am-10pm
Friday 8am-5pm
Saturday—Sunday 10am-6pm

Although the Nazis forbade Jews in the Lodz Ghetto to possess cameras, a few Jewish photographers were commissioned to document the efficiency of Ghetto labour. At their own initiative and at personal risk, they took thousands of photographs that reflect the efforts of ghetto inhabitants to maintain their dignity and culture in unspeakably harsh circumstances.

Assembled by the Topography of Terror Foundation in Berlin and mounted at the United Nations in New York, the exhibition is complemented by a series of lectures, films and panels.

Israel must include Arab minorities: conference

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

It's essential to improve the socio-economic status of Israel's Arab minorities and incorporate them more fully into Israeli life, participants at the second Irwin Green Conference in Toronto were told.

"There is a significant deficit of resource allocation, of public attention... There is a profound under-representation, in fields of higher education and in various sectors, of Israel's minorities," said DJ Schneeweiss, the Israeli consul general for Toronto and Western Canada, at the conference organized by the Israeli Arab issues committee of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. The theme of the conference, held at the Lipa Green Centre March 3, was "Israel's untapped potential."

"This is a drag on the economy, on our society, a potential time bomb and we have to address these inequalities," Schneeweiss said.

Amal Elsana Ahl'jooj, a Bedouin woman living in Israel, said Israel's minorities must have access to the same education and basic necessities that everyone else has. She's the fifth of 13 children, and she grew up with no water, no schools, no health clinics and no infrastructure.

DJ Schneeweiss

"I didn't choose to be an activist. I had tasks to do," she said.

At age five, she was the family shepherd, but there was one bright side, she said – "I had the great opportunity not to be raised in the kitchen. I was raised in the mountains, by myself."

Her grandmother was the one who encouraged her to change their way of living, Ahl'jooj said. "She taught me you don't have to cry and see yourself as a victim. You have to see yourself as someone who's able to change her own situation, take the lead and do things you believe in."

Even at five years old, she became aware that women were not equal in her society, she said. "Seeing your mother giving your brother a nice piece of chicken and not you, only because you are a girl. And they got a new coat, and you did not, only because you are a girl. This is very painful for a child," she said.

She also noticed very early on that she was a second-class citizen in Israel. "I remember the day when the police forces came to destroy my aunt's house. I asked my father why and he said, 'Because we are Arabs.'"

She said she came to the conference to describe her situation and offer hope.

At 14, she started teaching women in her village how to read and write – her mother was one of her first students. At 17, she established the first Bedouin women's organization dealing with women's rights in a patriarchal society.

One of the biggest challenges she deals with, she said, is that there is "no connection between democracy and minority rights. The average person will travel from his own city to Eilat, passing through the Bedouin villages and not asking himself a single question (about) why these people living without water, without electricity."

In order to change the situation, she founded the Arab Jewish Center for Equality, Empowerment and Cooperation (AJEEC) in 2000, which focuses on strengthening Jewish-Arab relations.

It's a huge challenge – Arab Bedouins and Druze make up only a small percentage of Israel's minorities.

Raya and Maimoon Azmi, a Druze couple who spoke at the conference, believe the Israeli government needs to create more inter-communal co-operation.

"The first time you meet a Druze is in the army," Raya Azmi said. "Why don't (Jewish Israelis) have trips to our villages, and not only to eat pita?"

The conference is named for philanthropist Irwin Green, who believed that more equality can strengthen the future of Israel. In 2000, at age 90, he became aware of Jewish-Arab inequalities and he established a development centre for Arab kids, two computer centres, a soccer field, a community centre and a youth centre, his son, Dan Green said.

"His last project was a vocational school for Arab women," Green said. "He passed away in Israel, a few months before he turned 100.

"He firmly believed in the importance of education (as) the key for people to advance themselves in Israel."

The legacy of Emanuel Ringelblum

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

They are the "documents of a catastrophe" and a vital resource for contemporary historians.

The secret archive of the doomed Warsaw Ghetto, compiled under the direction of Emanuel Ringelblum in the Oneg Shabbat project, is a direct link to the variegated voices of Polish Jews during the Holocaust in Poland.

Composed of diaries, letters, posters, decrees, candy wrappers, milk coupons, concert invitations, commissioned studies and the like, the project was the biggest one of its kind in Nazi-occupied Poland, said American historian Samuel Kassow in a lecture last week sponsored by the Centre for Jewish Studies at the University of Toronto.

The documents in the archive, which were amassed before the massive July 1942 deportation took place, portray a Jewish community under siege and duress.

Within a month of this catastrophic event, members of Oneg Shabbat buried the first cache of documents so that it would not fall into Nazi hands, said Kassow, a professor of history at Trinity College in Hartford, Conn.

Prior to the 1943 Warsaw ghetto revolt, yet more documents were hidden from the prying eyes of the Nazis.

On Sept. 18, 1946, 10 tin boxes containing some of the documents were discovered in the postwar ruins of Warsaw.

In December 1950, Polish construction workers building apartment houses on the site of the Nazi ghetto stumbled upon yet more documents in two aluminum milk cans.

A third cache, believed to be under China's embassy in Warsaw, was never found.

Although the documents unearthed to date represent but a small proportion of the Oneg Shabbat time capsules, they offer important and invaluable insights into life in the Warsaw ghetto.

"Ringelblum saw them as a resource for future historians," said Kassow.

Ringelblum did not want the history of the ghetto to be written by the Nazis, he added.

Kassow described Oneg Shabbat, staffed originally by 60 workers, as a form of resistance to Nazi tyranny. As he put it, "Jews resisted with paper and pen."

From the outset, Oneg Shabbat was imbued with what he called "a national mission."

From 1939 to 1940, Oneg Shabbat's goal was to "collect stuff," or all manner of documentation from the ghetto. Its agenda after that was to collect material of Jewish society under the Nazi yoke.

Eighty topics were chosen and a team leader was assigned to each one, he said.

Oneg Shabbat also gathered information about mass murder in extermination camps in Poland, some of which reached the Polish government-in-exile in Britain, Kassow noted.

Ringelblum, born in what is now Ukraine in 1900, was a historian, teacher and social worker deeply devoted to Yiddish culture.

Politically, he was a Marxist, a left-wing Zionist and a follower of Ber Borochov, one of the founders of the labour Zionist movement.

When World War II broke out, he was in Switzerland. He might have remained there, but chose to return to Poland.

A specialist in Polish Jews and Polish-Jewish relations, he rose to greatness as a historian during the Holocaust, when he directed the Oneg Shabbat project.

Emanuel Ringelblum

Although he was a left-winger, he instructed Oneg Shabbat workers to collect first-hand testimony from Jews from all social and political walks of life.

By 1942, Ringelblum was torn between a duty to protect his wife and son and an obligation to carry on with the project that will always define him.

He could have escaped to Hungary, but decided to stay in Poland, feeling he had an enormous responsibility to carry on with the project, Kassow said.

Ringelblum and his family managed to escape from Warsaw on the eve of the ghetto's destruction, but on March 7, 1944, the Gestapo found them.

Ringelblum was shot three days later, but nearly 70 years on his legacy glows brightly.

His co-workers did not fare well either. Only three of them survived the Holocaust.

Matchmaking site hopes to pair young Jews

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

A new dating site is hoping to help Toronto's young Jews find love from within their own culture and religion.

But JToronto (jtoronto.com) is not like JDate, where users post public profiles and browse the site, reviewing profiles and contacting people who they think would be a match. Instead, this site relies on a matchmaker to pair up men and women.

Many of the people on JDate aren't looking for a serious relationship, and there are many problems with fake profiles, said Rabbi Mendel Zaltzman, an organizer for JToronto and a rabbi for the Russian Jewish Community Centre. Additionally, not everybody wants to go public with their search for love.

JToronto gives them a discreet way to search, he said, since only the matchmakers can see the pool of participants.

The initiative was created to respond to the number of Jews who are marrying non-Jews not because they aren't interested in marrying within the faith, but because they couldn't find suitable Jewish partners.

JToronto was created as a counterpart to JMontreal, which was started by Rabbi Yisroel Bernath, director of Chabad of Notre-Dame-de-Grâce.

Despite the connection to rabbis, these sites aren't targeting observant Jews. There are no partnerships with synagogues. Instead, the service partners with secular community organizations such as Jewish Urban Meeting Place (JUMP) and Hillel. It's also supported by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and counts The CJN as a community partner.

"The idea is everyone who looks at it sees that we're a cross-spectrum organization," Rabbi Zaltzman said.

"There are organizations that represent all parts of the community. It's in essence any agency in the city that's working with that age group."

The age group in question is 25 to 40. Almost anything goes within that range, from non-observance through to modern Orthodox – just not haredi, since members of that community tend to use traditional matchmakers, Rabbi Zaltzman said.

Matchmaker Lesley Silver-Winick is originally from Montreal, but lives in Toronto, so she works with both cities' versions of the site. She uses her background in social services and education, as well as personal experience, to help connect users in each city, sometimes pairing up people from both cities' databases if they're interested.

To set people up, she first let's the computer suggest matches. From there, she speaks to each user to make more informed suggestions. For example, the algorithm may not match two people who would be suitable apart from their level of observance, so Silver-Winick would ask them about their willingness to compromise.

"We're trying to find quality matches for the members, so there's a lot of follow-up," she said, adding that she encourages members to at least have a phone conversation or coffee date with potential matches.

She's 52 years old and got married at 40, so she said she understands what it's like to search for a partner. She can especially relate to people in their 30s who may have to consider relationships with people who are divorced with kids, for example.

So far, she has 31 "mutually approved matches" in Toronto, out of the 175 people who have registered since the site went live almost three weeks ago. Out of her JMontreal matches, one couple recently announced their engagement, she said.

Roughly 200 people showed up to the Feb. 28 launch, Rabbi Zaltzman said, so already there's a larger pool than one would find from other methods such as speed-dating events, though he encourages people to try all methods of finding Jewish partners.

"So far, the buzz is out there. There's movement and it's steady," he said, adding that he's hoping the number of registrants will hit 1,000 by the High Holidays.

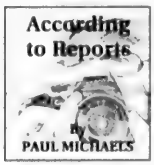
Hezbollah fights to prop up Assad's regime

Dexter Filkins might not have broken any new ground with After Syria, the cover story of the Feb. 25 New Yorker magazine, but he certainly fills in a lot of details in a riveting manner.

Reporting from Lebanon, Filkins discusses Hezbollah, its domination of the country, and its effort to maintain its stranglehold by fighting in Syria to prop up Assad's regime. After all, Hezbollah depends upon massive amounts of weapons – flown from Iran to Syria, where they are loaded onto trucks bound for Lebanon. Should Assad fall, this vital supply route would be imperilled. To keep it intact is as essential for Hezbollah's sponsor Iran as it is for Hezbollah itself.



Iran's Revolutionary Guard has trained, supplied and financially supported Hezbollah from the movement's inception in 1982. Hezbollah became Iran's "advanced force" (in Filkins' words) to confront Israel. He cites Paul Salem of the Carnegie Middle East Center in Beirut who dramatically remarked: "Hezbollah is an Iranian aircraft carrier parked north of Israel."

But as much as Hezbollah's raison d'être is to do Iran's bidding against Israel, it has to weigh its own future as the major Shia force facing the Sunni surge against Assad next door, and its spillover effect in Lebanon. Filkins spent time in a southern Beirut neighbourhood near Hezbollah headquarters with "Dani," one of the group's commanders. These same headquarters, incidentally, were rebuilt with Iranian money after being destroyed by Israeli aircraft in the 2006 war.

"It was clear," Filkins writes, "that Hezbollah's leaders had concluded that any change in Syria was almost certain to wash across the border, and that they were getting ready. 'If the Sunnis take over Syria,' Dani told me, 'we're going to be fighting them in Beirut.'"

Currently, Sunni and Shia Lebanese are already battling each other – in Syria. Sunni Lebanese who have joined the Free Syrian Army are clashing with Hezbollah fighters across the border in Assad's war-torn state, but try to avoid doing so on the Lebanese side out of concern that events could spiral out of control there. The fear, however, is that the longer the fighting in Syria continues, the greater the likelihood that Lebanon could once again be plunged into civil war.

Filkins provides a glimpse of this drift: "On a recent Friday morning in Sidon, a crowd of 3,000 Sunnis gathered at the Bilal bin Rabah mosque. They had come to hear Sheikh Ahmed al-Assir, one of the country's best-known Sunni preachers. Sidon is a Sunni-majority city in a region dominated by Hezbollah. In recent months, as the Syrian civil war has taken on a sectarian character, Sunni-Shia tensions have risen in Sidon, and Assir's sermons have become inflamed."

Filkins quotes Assir from one of these sermons: "You know, [Hezbollah leader] Hassan Nasrallah says he's not involved in Syria… And he's a liar! They rape women. They are slaughtering our children."

Assir also railed against Hezbollah's oppressive domination in Lebanon, predicting, according to Filkins, that Sunnis will rise up against Hezbollah just as they did against Assad. Others, however, caution that Hezbollah is simply far too strong to be confronted. For instance, Druze leader Walid Jumblatt (who has been in an uneasy alliance with Hezbollah) told Filkins that it would be "suicidal" to take on Hezbollah given its overwhelming strength. (The last time Hezbollah was challenged – in 2008, to give up its private communications network, not its weapons – it reacted by killing dozens of Sunnis and Christians.) Jumblatt also disputed the common assumption that Hezbollah would be weakened were Assad to fall, given that the movement already possesses some 50,000 missiles and is seeking alternative supply routes.

Filkins concludes by noting that, for all its problems (including a possible weakening of its role in the Lebanese Parliament as June elections draw near), Hezbollah remains determined, according to Dani, to prepare for the next round in its war against Israel.

UJA's Chief, Annual Development, Celebrates a Major Milestone

Lisa Morrison left the U.S. 30 years ago and hasn't looked back

By Daniel Horowitz

After completing a double masters program at the Baltimore Institute for Jewish Communal Service that prepares students to be leaders in the Jewish community, Lisa Morrison left her native U.S. and made the sojourn north.

And it didn't take long for Morrison – a native of Akron, Ohio - to demonstrate her commitment to Jews around the world, and to her new home of Toronto.

Morrison, who came to Toronto in 1982 to begin her career with UJA of Greater Toronto, didn't let a little thing like not yet having her landed immigrant papers get in the way.

While waiting for her paperwork to come through, Morrison decided to visit Refuseniks in the Soviet Union before spending two months on a kibbutz in Israel where she honed her Hebrew skills.

It's that type of decision-making that has seen Morrison, Chief of Annual Development, ascend the UJA ranks quickly, in a career that recently passed the 30-year mark.

Morrison already knew a bit about Toronto, having visited the city with her high school choir.

"I think that the instinctive and passionate Zionism in Toronto is stronger and more all encompassing than anywhere I've ever lived," says Morrison, who was never ambivalent about her Judaism. "In 1975 I was probably the only person in my high school who wore a pin that said, 'Zionism is a badge of honour,' after the UN had declared that Zionism was racism."

But upon arriving in Toronto, she quickly found others who could relate to her passion for Jewish life.

Lisa Morrison

"When I first moved here, I was impressed by how pervasive a strong Jewish identity was among so many who were my age," says Morrison. "As someone who had left home for university at 18, I was also shocked by how many people my age still lived at home. I came to realize that was part of why so many young people here had strong connections to Friday night dinners, holidays and family. I thought to myself, 'what a haymisha, truly Jewish community I've come to.'"

The die was cast, and Morrison was a true Torontonian, and she hasn't looked back since.

"I felt like I had found an incredible gem in Toronto," explains Morrison. "I couldn't imagine finding another community with as much Jewish soul and love of Israel as I have found here. I think there are more people here per capita working at living a Jewish life and giving their children a Jewish education than anywhere else."

Knowing how rare a community like Jewish Toronto is, Morrison hopes we never take it for granted.

"I am constantly telling people around me that they have no clue what they have in Toronto," she says. "Jews who are born and raised here think that this is the way every Jewish community operates. I think sometimes that you have to come from elsewhere to truly appreciate the Jewish neshama of this community."

And, in thirty years as a fundraiser in Toronto, Morrison, who has led some 30 UJA missions to Israel, has seen her share of changes in the city's philanthropic landscape.

"There is huge competition for fundraising dollars in the Jewish community today that didn't exist when I first arrived," she explains. "The fact that UJA has to constantly explain and reinforce why it is different than other fundraising campaigns in this city is an uphill battle that is definitely challenging, but well worth it. The older generation knew that UJA was dealing with the most important existential issues facing the Jewish people and while that continues to be our raison d'être, I think it's harder for the younger generation to understand that, and relate to it, but I'm hopeful that they will."

"UJA Federation and the Toronto Jewish Community are blessed by the fact that Lisa's Jewish professional communal journey brought her here to build a life and a wonderful career," says Ted Sokolsky, President & CEO, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Passover cleaning, Part 1

Sure it's known as the holiday of national liberation. Just don't try to convince that to anyone who has been spending countless hours cleaning for Passover. But just remember you're not alone – and there are plenty of people who want to share their cleaning tips with you.

You can't get much more user friendly than a web page with a title like: "How To Do Your Pesach Cleaning Happily in Less Than One Day." In it, Rabbi Shlomo Aviner passes along the basics: how to deal with children's clothing, medicines and toiletries, high chairs, cars and, of course, the kitchen. He concludes, "In light of what is written above, it should take about an hour to clean the house, another hour for the dining room, and two to three hours to kasher the kitchen. In short, about one day!" Wow. [http://bit.ly/passclean1]

On the other hand, there's Stephanie Savir. I'm sure she means well. She really does. But if you look at her site and haven't started your own cleaning, perhaps you should just file away her advice for next year. Her Ten Tips for Reducing Pesach Pressure include advice for what to do "seven weeks before Passover: review and copy recipes; buy paper goods and cleaning supplies." At six weeks: "Buy yom tov outfits for family; clean bedrooms." At five weeks: "Clean basement and cars." And so on. [http://bit.ly/passclean2]

Before he gets into the nitty-gritty, Rabbi Moshe Finkelstein explains why modern Passover causes cleaning angst. In the past, wealthy people who lived in large homes had servants to do their cleaning. Poor people who could not afford servants lived in small homes with one or two rooms. "Today, we seem to be caught in a trap," Rabbi Finkelstein writes. Our homes are larger. Furniture, utensils and clothing are more plentiful. But we don't have the servants to do the cleaning. So the weeks before the holiday become filled with cleaning. [http://bit.ly/passclean4]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

Whether or not you enjoy cleaning, do take care with those industrial strength cleansers. Yona Amitai, a senior toxicologist at Hadassah University Hospital in Jerusalem, warns that "the number of accidental poisonings of children from cleaning fluid triples during the two or three weeks before Passover." [http://bit.ly/passclean3]

If you're feeling overwhelmed cleaning for your army, be thankful you don't have a real one to worry about like the Israel Defence Forces. Just imagine the logistics of locking away a sea of cutting boards, knives, deep fryers, strainers and frying pans before hauling out 110 tons of matzah meal and 25,000 litres of grape juice! [http://bit.ly/passclean5]

Finally, in the going-overboard department, here are some home-owners who have way too much time – and aluminum foil – on their hands. In their (tongue-in-cheek) photo essay, they have enveloped everything (!) in tin foil that may have ever had contact with chametz, including their couch and corner tables. But why stop there when you can also foil over your TV, lamps, dresser and for good measure, a teddy bear, toothpaste and toilet, too. [http://bit.ly/passclean6]

Well, I guess that's a wrap.

Pesach customs are key to our heritage

Pesach is not only about food bans and kitchen anxieties. Entire books have been written about the many colourful and interesting customs of different Jewish communities.

The seder itself is marked by many different customs. Iraqi and Kurdish Jews begin the seder with a dramatic dialogue. One of the children goes outside, knocks on the door and then answers the questions of the seder leader: "Where have you come from?" "Egypt." "Where are you going?" "To Jerusalem." "What are your supplies?"

The child answers by reciting the Four Questions, thereby opening the seder.

A similar custom is observed by Yemenite Jews, who perform a symbolic re-enactment of the Exodus. The seder leader gets up from the table, throws the afikoman in its bag over his back like a knapsack, walks around the room leaning on a cane and relates to those assembled how he has just now come out of Egypt and experienced miracles.

Afghan Jews take a thick, footlong scallion. As they come to the singing of Dayeinu, each person bangs his onion over the head and arms of his neighbours. Nobody seems to know the origin or rationale of this custom.

Among Sephardi Jews, the blessing on the wine is recited on the first and third cup, whereas Ashkenazim recite it on every cup.

The text of Ashkenazi and Sephardi Haggadot is basically the same, although there are some minor differences. Toward the end of the seder, there is greater freedom and variety among Sephardim. Among some people, the concluding songs may be sung in a variety of languages.

Sephardi Window

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

Jews of North African or Asian origin – and some Chassidim whose roots go back to 19th-century Eretz Yisrael – sing Chad Gadya in Judaeo-Arabic. Eastern European Jews have been known to sing a Yiddish version of Echad Mi Yodea (Who Knows One). German Jews sing Adir Hu, the hymn ending in a prayer for the rebuilding of the Temple, in medieval German.

On the last day of Pesach, there are various ways of celebrating and re-enacting the parting of the Red Sea.

In many communities, both Ashkenazi and Sephardi, it's customary to gather toward midnight in the synagogue or in the town square to recite the Song of the Sea (Exodus 15), with much singing, dancing and rejoicing.

But the question remains: why should Jews continue to observe these customs? Is there no way that the rabbis can unify Jewish practice on such a basic point?

From a halachic perspective, any custom accepted by a community over a significant period of time carries great weight. Time and again, rabbis defend a seemingly inexplicable practice with the reasoning that "this is a venerable custom, observed by communities since earliest times, and one is not to change it."

I believe that these traditions make us into Am Yisrael. They define our being and link us to our ancestors. Without them, Jews wouldn't be able to keep their beliefs.

Let us all research and keep our family's traditions. They're an integral part of our being.

Rethinking the bar mitzvah

The espoused theory is that a bar or bat mitzvah serves as a ritualized entry into the Jewish community – the point when a child takes on the obligations, challenges and opportunities of Jewish life. For too many, however, the celebration is just the opposite. Bar and bat mitzvahs have become a graduation from Jewish engagement.

Fewer than 50 per cent of Jewish teens are involved in ongoing Jewish experiences. In many communities – both geographically and religiously defined – this number drops to under 10 per cent. Framing its Campaign for Youth Engagement, the Union for Reform Judaism notes that 80 per cent of children who become bnei mitzvah will have no connection to their synagogue by the time they graduate high school.

Class Act

Daniel Held

Jewish teens are involved in non-Jewish extracurricular activities at astounding rates. Nearly 97 per cent of Jewish teens in a recent study were engaged in extracurricular activities, but only seven per cent cite a specifically Jewish activity.

Why is this the case? There's no one reason. Parents do not reinforce the importance of Jewish activities. Jewish teen programs lack both the resources and the momentum to fulfil their mandates. The drive toward university pulls teens into resume-building activities. Teenagers question structures of religious conservatism. The list goes on and on.

Complicit in distancing teens from Jewish engagement is the current structure of bar and bat mitzvahs. In order to have a bar or bat mitzvah, many synagogues require enrolment in day or congregational schools from Grade 4 onward – an incentive that antagonizes children and encourages them to drop out as soon as they have chanted their Torah portion.

In a similar vein, parents and synagogue leaders are so concerned about their child's performance at the bar or bat mitzvah that the curriculum in the years leading up to the event is focused on the skills and knowledge needed for that one day, circumventing more exciting and engaging topics.

So what can be done? The solutions are as varied as the challenges.

In some Reform congregations, confirmation, a group ceremony for high school students, has successfully lengthened teens' engagement in synagogue learning. In other cases, however, confirmation has merely delayed graduation day.

Recently there has been a call to ban bar mitzvahs. Patrick Aleph, the outspoken founder of Punk Torah, argues in a recent Kveller article that bar mitzvahs don't accomplish much, are a modern invention that don't promote Jewish continuity, represent a welfare cheque to synagogues, and make adults look like hypocrites.

Banning bar and bat mitzvahs is an unrealistic suggestion. The ceremony does mark an important celebration of Jewish life, carries a significant emotional connection, and plays countless other educational, financial and structural roles in the ecosystem of Jewish living.

At the same time, it's time for change. The Union for Reform Judasim and Hebrew Union College have launched the B'nai Mitzvah Revolution. In partnership with 14 congregations, they're piloting and studying new models for bar and bat mitzvahs that will transform the ceremonies' role in Jewish development.

This kind of experimentation is critical, but it requires the buy-in of synagogues, rabbis, educators, communities, parents and children. Only through such a collaborative effort can bar and bat mitzvahs serve as the bridge rather than the roadblock in a child's movement from pediatric to adult engagement in Jewish life.

Program gives teen girls useful skills

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Ashreinu, a year-round program for Jewish girls, offers a unique opportunity for students at Beth Jacob High School for Girls to learn leadership skills and also provide a service to the greater community, says the organization's director, Rivky Coffer.

Approaching its 20th year of existence, the non-profit organization (campashreinu.ca) was started in 1994 by two Grade 11 students who now live in Israel.

Ashreinu has grown to serve hundreds of girls, mainly public school students but also some Jewish day school students, Coffer said. "It's a beautiful mix."

In addition to programs such as Shabbatons, trips, parties and Sunday school, there are two affiliated summer camps – a day camp and an overnight camp.

The Sunday school offers one-on-one learning with volunteers at whatever level is appropriate.

"It's not just learning alephbet," Coffer said. "If a girl doesn't know how to read, it's reading. Or, if a child is in yeshiva day school, they could be doing their Rashi and Chumash homework, and we help them… almost like private tutoring."

As well, there is a teen mentoring program and a program for alumnae. "We always have to grow with our girls," Coffer said.

Coffer, a native of New York who has been with the organization for 14 years and teaches Grade 8 Judaic studies at Eitz Chaim Day School, said there was "a need for an organization for children from unaffiliated homes, or even girls that are in day schools."

Summer is "a good time to enhance their Jewish pride, and make it more real," she said. "Sometimes kids go to school, and things are in theory, but when you come to camp, Judaism is alive and exciting."

Day camp is held at Beth Jacob, which has an indoor swimming pool.

Some 300 campers attend the day camp, and about 65 girls go to the overnight camp in Muskoka.

Adina Kerzner, a 20-year-old Ashreinu volunteer who has been involved with the organization since Grade 11, said, "I love working with kids, and wanted to get them excited about being Jewish. All that aside, it's a fun place to work. You feel like one big family."

As well, she has gained practical experience and skills. "I used to hate making phone calls," said Kerzner, who is working on a degree in social work at Yeshiva University. "In high school, I was the technical head, arranging transportation and putting events together… You learn how to do things."

Although she signed up because her friends were becoming involved and she wanted to volunteer, her perspective has evolved.

She said that participants and volunteers both "end up learning so much more about themselves and about Judaism." Some of the younger girls have asked her questions about Judaism that she'd never really considered before, she added.

Toronto lawyer produces film about Herzl

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Toronto lawyer David Matlow has an incredible but unusual passion for the founder of modern political Zionism, Theodor Herzl.

So much so that he has the world's largest private collection of Herzl memorabilia and has now made a documentary film about Herzl's life and times.

My Herzl, a Canada-Israel co-production produced by Matlow and directed by his Israeli brother-in-law, Eli Tal-El, is due to be screened for one night only on April 22 at the Silver City theatre at Yonge and Eglinton in support of the Ann and Max Tannenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

Matlow, 52, has exhibited his Herzl collection, consisting of 2,500 objects from postcards and postage stamps to plates and pen knives, at various venues, including Beth Tzedec Congregation and the Baycrest senior care facility.

And while these exhibits have been informative in educating people about Herzl the man and the visionary, they have had limited exposure.

But since almost everyone likes movies, My Herzl is an opportunity to communicate lessons about Herzl and the Zionist movement to a considerably wider audience, said Matlow, a corporate securities and private equity lawyer at Goodmans LLP.

My Herzl, set in locales inextricably associated with Herzl, is based on a trip Matlow organized to Basel, Switzerland, for himself and his family and relatives and friends in August 2010, just months before he turned 50.

Basel was where the first Zionist Congress took place in 1897 and where Herzl – who died at 44 in 1904 after battling heart disease – prophetically predicted the birth of Israel within 50 years.

Matlow asked 27 people to join him in Basel. Apart from his wife, three daughters, sisters and their husbands and children, participants also included his late mother, Esther, a former president of Canadian Hadassah WIZO to whom My Herzl is dedicated, and friends such as Dr. Barry Simon and David and Ellen Chaikof and their families.

The group stayed at the Three Kings Hotel, where Herzl slept, and, like Herzl, posed for photographs on the balcony overlooking the scenic Rhine River.

Meanwhile, Tal-El, a professional filmmaker from Jerusalem, travelled with a Dror Habonim youth delegation to Budapest and Paris, cities bound up with Herzl.

For Matlow, the film was a chance to share his passion with people closest to him in a city so vitally important in the annals of Zionism.

He considers Herzl an inspirational figure who tirelessly used his talents to help lay the foundation for the establishment of Israel.

"He did something," said Matlow. "He just didn't talk about it."

In light of Herzl's achievements, he noted, "all dreams are possible."

"During the late 1800s, the notion of a sovereign Jewish state was the most preposterous, most far-fetched and most ridiculous idea anyone ever had," he explained. "Yet it came true because people starting with Herzl believed in the idea, and worked towards that goal."

Herzl also personifies sacrifice, he added.

"Herzl sacrificed his own wealth, health and family to his objective of creating a Jewish state. He causes us to reflect on the sacrifices we might be prepared to make for the things we believe in."

Commenting on Herzl's contemporary relevance, Matlow said, "We should use our skills, talents and energy to complete Herzl's dream – a Jewish state that is safe, secure and living in peace."

The film portrays Herzl as an imperfect man who accomplished great things, he observed.

"Herzl was human, but we all have the potential to do great things. Are we doing all we can for what we believe in? Learning about Herzl allows us to reflect on this question about ourselves."

The Hebrew-language poster for My Herzl.

My Herzl, a blend of history and travelogue, features the observations of, among others, Robert Wistrich, a Hebrew University historian and specialist in antisemitism.

Wistrich describes Herzl – a Budapest-born assimilationist disillusioned by the Dreyfus Affair in France – as a person who transformed himself in the face of anti-Jewish animus in 19th-century Europe.

Wistrich suggests that Palestine, an Ottoman backwater even as late as the early 20th century, was a bleak and forbidding land, "not the kind of place you'd expect millions of Jews" to immigrate.

My Herzl, which is being submitted to Jewish movie festivals around the world by Ruth Diskin Films in Jerusalem, offers sharply divergent views of Herzl. Matlow regards him glowingly, while Tal-El initially sees him as a washed up icon.

In passing, the film scolds Israel for having treated Herzl as a myth rather than as a man with a family for far too long.

Although My Herzl may expose many more Torontonians to a slice of Zionist lore, Matlow intends to continue bringing his Herzl collection to new venues. From April 12 to 30, it will be exhibited at Congregation Machzikei Hadas in Ottawa.

CARING TO THE CORE: Aaron's Apple, a charity started by Aaron Maresky and his parents, Mandy and Neil, helps families pay for their chronically ill children's medical expenses. It recently held its second annual Caring to the Core gala fundraiser, co-chaired by Mandy Maresky and Janet Klugsberg, which featured a live band, a silent auction and raffle prizes, and attracted more than 500 participants. For more information on Aaron's Apple, go to www.aaronsapple.com. Seen from left are Mandy, Aaron and Neil Maresky.

PASSOVER PLAYERS

100 DAYS
Bobbins Hebrew Academy kindergarten students – including Liam Klein, left, and Gabriel Pinhasov – love counting and finally counted all the way up to the 100th day of school. They celebrated by eating 100 things; counting to 100 by 1s, 2s, 5s and 10s; moving their bodies 100 different ways; drawing what they will look like when they are 100 years old and writing their numbers to 100.

Geraldine Baylee Ezrin ז"ל, age 86, died in Tarzana, California in the presence of her extended family on February 27, 2013, after a lengthy illness. She is survived by her husband, her brother, 7 children, 12 grandchildren and 2 great-grandchildren.

She was born in Toronto, Canada, where she met Calvin, the love of her life, as a teenager and with whom she had partnered for the rest of her days. She was a talented, artistic, creative, beautiful woman and soul. Her musical abilities were transmitted to all of her children. Many generations resided in her home, including her mother of beloved memory, her children, grandchildren and countless others needing a place to rest and be nurtured.

Donations may be made to the Mr. Holland's Opus foundation (www.mhopus.org) fulfilling her dream of supporting music instruction for children.

Wolfie's owner devoted to family

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Wolfe (Wolfie) Zimmerman, the longtime owner of Wolfie's deli on Sheppard Avenue West, who died March 2 at age 91, is remembered for his devotion to his family.

His daughter, Gila Gelberman, said in an interview that nothing beyond his family was of importance to him. "If every child had a father like him, there would be no problems in the world."

Wolfe Zimmerman at his deli

Born in Poland, Zimmerman, one of eight siblings, survived 13 labour camps, and was liberated from the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp in 1945. His mother and five siblings were murdered.

He met and married his wife, Rose – she died 17 years ago – in a displaced persons' camp. They moved to Israel, and in 1959, came to Canada, where he became a house painter.

Gelberman said that her father died two days after his wife's yahrzeit, "probably because he tried to make it the same day. He wanted to make it easier for us by having only one yahrtzeit."

Her father knew that she had been planning to travel to Israel to spend Passover with her children, she said. "I think he wanted us to go. He died [several] weeks before Pesach, so we could still go. He knew we would never have left him."

Zimmerman opened Wolfie's with his children 37 years ago, and worked until age 83, when his doctor told him to stop, she said.

"He never complained, nothing was ever wrong. On his last day he thanked God for his life, and said he was coming."

David Gelberman, his son-in-law, who worked with Zimmerman since they opened Wolfie's, said that Zimmerman had a charisma that made people feel at home the minute they walked into the deli. "His [love of people] was his best feature.

"What kind of man was he? I'm going to say Kaddish twice a day for my father-in-law. That's the kind of man I think he was."

In addition to Gila and David Gelberman, Zimmerman leaves his daughter Toby Richards, four grandchildren and eight great-grandchildren.

Cemeteries merged

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Two of Montreal's oldest Jewish cemeteries have merged into one legal entity.

Back River Memorial Gardens and Baron de Hirsch Cemetery are now Baron de Hirsch-Back River Cemeteries Inc., under a single administration.

The merger makes official a de facto relationship the two cemeteries have had for some years. Baron de Hirsch was professionally managing Back River, while two separate boards of directors and corporations were maintained.

הסרט האמריקאי שהציל את ישראל

מה שכן, שני סרטים אלה, למרות המסר הקשה שלהם- הינם ההוכחה הכי ניצחת עד כמה ישראל היא דמוקרטית, בזה שהיא מאפשרת לראשי השב"כ לדבר חפשי ובזה שהיא מממנת סרטים לפי טיבם ולא לפי האידיאולוגיה שלהם.

תיאטרון המפגש-"לילה במאי"

ההפקה החמישית של תיאטרון המפגש הישראלי, שנתמך על ידי המדרשה הציונית של טורונטו, הוקדשה להצגתו של הסופר א.ב.יהושע שעוסקת בסיפורה של משפחה ירושלמית בימים שלפני מלחמת ששת הימים. אני חייב להתחיל ולאמר שלא הצלחתי להתחבר להצגה הזאת והיא נראתה לי, כמי שהיה שם, לא מציאותית ומאד פלצנית. מוטב היה לו הסופר הידוע היה ממשיך לכתוב ספרים ולא מחזות. אבל מה שהרבה יותר חשוב- היו ההפקה המושקעת של תמי ברמן, הבמוי של יעל פיינגולד והמשחק הטוב של שבעת השחקנים. דתי פרידמן וטטיאנה סטולניץ הם שחקנים מקצועיים שתענוג לראות על במה. אורלי בוצר, אסא ושחר גרוס ולידם ניר צור עשו עבודה יפה מאד, ושוש קביסה נגעה מאד ללב כאשה זקנה על סף טירוף, כשהיא בעצם הנורמאלית היחידה על הבמה.

ובאותו עניין-את הערב פתחה יעל קרול, יו"ר הוועדה לקידום העניין הישראלי במדרשה, שלקחה על עצמה למצוא דרכים חדשות להכליל את הישראלים בטורונטו. יעל התחילה במספר יוזמות חדשות להביא את עשרות אלפי הישראלים שכאן להשתלב בקהילה שלנו. וכדבריה: יש הרבה מקום פנוי להתנדבות ופעילות. רק צריך לרצות. רק שיישאר בינינו.

MASK MAKERS

Seniors from the Freeman Family Day Centre at Baycrest Health Sciences unveiled colorful sculpted facemasks of themselves on March 6. The mask-making was a joint project with Grade 9 students from the Arts Westmount program at Westmount Collegiate Institute in Thornhill. Here, Day Centre member Eva Dykstein proudly holds her pink mask with her project partners Maya Romi, left, and Olivia Kulbak, both 14.

Union move upsets many workers

Postal worker Fred Toulch, however, believes the union's anti-Israel stance and the article are not in line with members' views. "The people I've spoken to are certainly not in favour of it, including non-Jewish postal workers. Most are upset that not enough is being done for postal workers," he said.

"I've spoken to a few letter carriers and they're not happy that the union has taken this position on international affairs. This is not just over this article. It's going on now for some time."

Toulch said the postal workers he's talked to ask, "Why are they involved in this? This is not what they want to have done with union dues."

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said CUPW's anti-Israel positions "don't represent the mainstream of their own membership."

He said union members he's spoken to oppose it and would like CUPW to focus on issues concerning their employment and job security.

"I think the membership expects the leadership would be focused exclusively on securing their positions, ensuring with management they don't come under pressure to reduce the work force," he said.

Fogel said that CUPW, along with some other unions, churches and academic groups, are directed by "small groups that have a radical agenda. They co-opt the control process to drive their agenda, mostly without the knowledge and understanding of the membership they represent."

"They're undermining their own credibility and diminishing the capacity to be effective representatives of their membership," he said.

Other Jewish organizations also took aim at CUPW. The Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC) condemned "the racist anti-Israel propaganda perpetuated by the CUPW" and B'nai Brith Canada CEO Frank Diamant said that it's "a distortion of the CUPW core mandate to use union resources in this fashion to demonize and delegitimize the Jewish state, while ignoring real human rights violations across the globe."

Ottawa shul sells building — again

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Once again, it appears that Congregation Beth Shalom's property in downtown Ottawa has been sold.

The 81,000-square-foot building had been conditionally sold in late 2011 to developer Claridge Homes for $15 million, with a possibility the price could be up to $9 million higher if the city gave permission to increase the site's density.

But on the final date for waiving conditions contained in the agreement, Claridge advised the shul that it would not proceed with the purchase, leaving the Conservative Beth Shalom to put the property back on the market.

Ian Sherman, president of the congregation, told The CJN at that time that there had been "a significant degree of interest from multiple parties," and that he was sure the building would be sold.

An agreement has now been entered into, conditionally, with a subsidiary of Trinity Developments Group for the same financial terms as the previous agreement with Claridge. Trinity's 90-day conditional period will expire May 8 and, if all goes well, the closing date for the sale is scheduled for Dec. 31.

"The Dec. 31 closing date on this transaction has certainly caused some anxiety amongst our executive committee, our board of governors, our clergy and staff and our valued members, and I am fully empathetic to that," Sherman said.

"Nonetheless, I have always been an individual who sees beyond the challenges, and I look at the many opportunities that can lie ahead for Congregation Beth Shalom if, and when, we do this right."

The main challenge facing the congregation is to find its future location. Various options continue to be examined, including a relocation to the existing Jewish community "campus" along with the Soloway Jewish Community Centre, Hillel Lodge and the Ottawa Jewish Commnity School, or a possible amalgamation with Agudath Israel Congregation, another Conservative synagogue in the capital.

"My objective for our shul is that we recognize our ability to be communal leaders and respond to our current opportunity to not only continue as a vibrant shul in Ottawa but at the same time to reshape our community in a fiscally prudent and responsible manner. Personal motivations of the short term must be set aside in favour of the longer-term security of our shul and appropriate community building," Sherman said.

The downtown building, which housed a Jewish community centre and other Jewish communal offices in addition to the synagogue before the new suburban Jewish community campus was completed in 1998, had in recent years been renting space to a number of charitable groups.

Many have already vacated or are planning to vacate the building, and the 350-family congregation can't afford to maintain the premises. The demographics of the community have also changed, with most families having moved to the suburbs, all of which prompted the shul's decision to sell and move.

German museum hands painting to Concordia

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A German museum has restituted a valuable Nazi-looted painting to the estate of the late Max Stern, who owned the Dominion Gallery in Montreal for many years.

The late 15th-century work had been in the possession of the Staatsgalerie Stuttgart since 1948. The Jewish Stern, who had owned an art gallery in Dusseldorf, sold the painting under duress from the Nazis in 1938. He did so from London, England, where he had fled the year before, said Clarence Epstein, who heads Concordia University's Max Stern Art Restitution Project, in a telephone interview from Berlin.

This 15th-century painting by the Master of Flémalle was restituted by a German museum to the estate of Max Stern, who had been forced to sell it by the Nazis on the eve of World War II.

Epstein received Virgin and Child, attributed to the Master of Flémalle, an unknown Flemish artist considered a leading exponent of the early Northern Renaissance, in a ceremony at the Canadian Embassy in Berlin on March 5.

In attendance were representatives of the state-owned museum, which is the first German cultural institution to return a Stern artwork in the 10-year history of the project, as well as of the State of Bavaria-Wurttemberg and the Canadian government, including Jason Kenney, minister of citizenship, immigration and multiculturalism.

This is the 10th artwork recovered by the project since 2006, and the second from Germany. A painting was earlier handed over by a casino in that country.

Epstein said the evidence is that Stern liquidated this painting and several others to help raise the 25,000 Reichsmarks needed to obtain an exit visa for his mother.

Although no bill of sale has been found, it is believed the painting was sold at well below its value. Some 200 paintings of Stern's were auctioned off previously in Cologne in 1937 for bargain-basement prices under orders from the Nazi regime, just before Stern left the country.

While some gaps in its provenance remain, Epstein said it is known that the painting passed through two hands before 1948. Frankfurt art dealer Alexander Haas sold it to a Dr. Scheufelen, an important collector, during World War II. Scheufelen willed about 125 works to the Staatsgalerie Stuttgart, including Virgin and Child.

Epstein would not comment on the painting's value today, only that it's "insured for a considerable amount."

Stern, who died childless in 1987, left the bulk of his estate to Concordia, as well as McGill University and the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Concordia, which has been working in collaboration with the New York State-based Holocaust Claims Processing Office, corresponded with the State of Baden-Wurttemberg for about five years, Epstein said.

"They felt that the information we had was not complete," he said. "Then one of our researchers found a key document in Germany, which placed Stern and the painting in that era."

The painting will not be coming to Montreal immediately, nor has it been decided whether it will be loaned to the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts, as earlier recovered works have been, said Epstein.

In the meantime, it's expected the painting will be entrusted to experts, probably in London or New York, for analysis of its physical condition and scholarly perusal.

In the past, Epstein has been critical of the response the restitution project has received in Germany, but he said, "We had a good relationship with the Staatsgalerie researchers and Baden-Wurttemberg officials. They were very professional. I was impressed with their transparency and willingness to collaborate."

It is believed that a significant number of the approximately 400 works Stern was forced to sell are in Germany today, including in public institutions.

Concordia president Alan Shepard commented that "the most immediate challenge lies in encouraging a number of other museums currently in possession of Stern paintings to follow the lead of the Staatsgalerie."

The handover at the embassy took place within the context of another exchange: Canada's assumption of the chair of the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance

The IHRA (formerly the Task Force for International Co-operation on Holocaust Education, Remembrance and Research) is an intergovernmental body initiated by then-Swedish prime minister Goran Persson in 1998. Currently, 31 countries are members.

Former Toronto Liberal MP Mario Silva, who is the new IHRA chair, was also present in Berlin.

An IHRA conference will be held in Toronto in October.

IAW at Carleton quieter this year, students say

Sammy Hudes
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — As many anticipated, Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) at Carleton University ran its course more quietly this year than in the past, and unlike its predecessors, this year's edition wasn't endorsed by the school's undergraduate student union.

The Carleton University Students' Association (CUSA) executive chose not to help anti-Israel activists campaign for IAW, unlike in previous years, according to CUSA president Alexander Golovko.

Golovko said he was bothered to see an IAW sign hanging in the window of CUSA's office in the University Centre last year and wanted to make sure neither pro- nor anti-Israel activists had an "unequal advantage" this time around.

"CUSA spaces have been utilized to promote one side's story, and I think that is very inadequate, seeing as how the student association represents 23,000 students," said Golovko, who campaigned last year on "student issues, student unity" and "the spirit of democracy," and was endorsed by Hillel Ottawa.

IAW ran March 4 to 8 at Carleton, as well as on other North American campuses, and was organized by Students Against Israeli Apartheid (SAIA), a Carleton club. It featured workshops, film screenings and panel discussions on what SAIA described as apartheid in both Israel and Canada, according to SAIA activist Rana Hamadeh.

It also included workshops on the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) campaign against Israel and companies invested in Israel's economy, she said.

Speaking before the week's activities, Emile Scheffel, Israel advocacy co-ordinator at Hillel Ottawa, said he wasn't expecting IAW to be as loud as it has been in the past on campus.

"We expect the attendance at events to be the smallest we've seen in a couple of years, and we don't expect it to make as much of an impact on campus, frankly," Scheffel said.

He attributed this prediction to poor publicity by IAW organizers and a lack of interest among the student body in participating in the "division and toxicity" seen in previous years at Carleton.

"It's just the national trend," Scheffel said.

"There's just been minimal buzz and very little advertising of [SAIA's] events… Most of them are evening events rather than daytime events, so we think that most of the people who do come out to them will be people who are already of that certain persuasion," he said. "[They're] basically preaching to the choir."

SAIA and Ottawa's Israel Awareness Committee (IAC) set up information tables alongside one another throughout the week in Carleton's University Centre. The IAC booth included a poster outlining the similarities between Canadian and Israeli democracy.

But Hamadeh and SAIA contend that the two countries are also similar in that Canada's treatment of its aboriginal peoples was a model for the apartheid system in South Africa, which Hamadeh claimed in turn inspired what she and her group calls "Israeli apartheid."

Golovko said CUSA's executive board reached out to both sides of the issue at the start of the year "in the hope to sit down and discuss the question [of] how a student association can ensure that while dialogue takes place, it takes place in a constructive manner and a respectful fashion."

However, Golovko said CUSA still hasn't been able to bring the IAC and SAIA together.

"The IAC has been very open to dialogue and discussion with our organization in the past year, and for that we are very grateful," Golovko said, adding that SAIA never responded to CUSA's requests.

"We're still hoping for the activists of SAIA to be able to sit down in a similar fashion and discuss what are some of their needs and perhaps facilitate the dialogue."

But Hamadeh said SAIA's purpose isn't to negotiate, which is why the group hasn't responded to CUSA's invitation.

"We have a stated mandate, which is to divest. We're not here to discuss one-state or two-state solutions," she said.

The primary goal of IAW is to support the BDS campaign, which seeks "to reach a place where we can have real peace negotiations," Hamadeh said.

"Currently, Palestine is under occupation," she said. "They do not have negotiating power. They are not at an equal level with Israel."

Scheffel reiterated his belief that students are getting tired of this point of view.

"I think people are going to start really rejecting the toxic, divisive politics that IAW represents," he said.

Canadian politicians slam Israel 'hatefest'

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Several Canadian politicians have spoken about Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW), criticizing the annual anti-Israel campaign on campuses as intolerant and hateful.

York Centre Conservative MP Mark Adler shared his perspective in a statement that urged students to think twice before joining in the week's activities. He also brought the issue up in the House of Commons.

"Israeli Apartheid Week is a deceitful and malicious attempt to delegitimize Israel under the cloak of academic freedom. This discriminatory event singles out the Jewish state and calls into question its basic right to exist when, in fact, Israel is the only democracy in the Middle East," he said. "I ask that my colleagues in the House join me in condemning Israeli Apartheid Week's antisemitic hatefest and offer support to those who stand with Israel."

The minister of citizenship, immigration and multiculturalism, Jason Kenney, released a statement that said although he supports the right of everyone to freely and publicly express their views, including criticism of government policies and practices, he was concerned with the "reckless and overheated rhetoric" associated with campus anti-Israel activities.

He said organizers and participants have a "regrettable history of promoting and holding events in ways that disregard the security and rights of Jewish faculty and students, censor other points of view, and limit academic discourse.

"The disproportionate vitriol directed against the democratic State of Israel during Israeli Apartheid Week stands in stark and ironic contrast to the silence of IAW organizers on the ongoing atrocities committed by the Syrian regime against its own citizens, and on the rampant brutalities and denial of rights in non-democratic countries in the Middle East and elsewhere in the world," he said.

Interim Liberal Leader Bob Rae said the week is counterproductive in achieving social justice, and also pointed out that IAW focuses solely on Israel, attempting to delegitimize the state while ignoring the human rights crises in surrounding countries.

Mark Adler

"When all who desire peace in the region should be supporting and encouraging respectful dialogue between parties, this week sets out to do the opposite," he wrote, calling the name of the campaign deeply prejudicial.

"Canadian universities and academic institutions have a long history of providing a space to engage in enlightened discourse on issues of justice and equality. For this reason, it is all the more difficult to comprehend a focus that ignores terrible atrocities presently taking place in the region," he wrote.

"Demonizing one people and one country does not encourage reconciliation, co-operation or respectful discourse about peace and democratization in the Middle East. A constructive approach to the Israeli-Palestinian issue would be more effective if it persuaded governments and civil society to work with both parties to reach a negotiated resolution based on dialogue and understanding."

Leukemia fundraiser organized by kids

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

A recent event for kids, organized by kids, raised $18,000 in support of Imagine a Cure for Leukemia.

Some 500 campers from several summer camps and their families attended the fundraiser Camp Imagine on March 3, at the venue Six Degrees in Toronto.

Campers who are in grades 1 to 8 and their families participated in various activities, including basketball challenges and crafts, at the afternoon event.

Camp Imagine was the brainchild of 10-year-old Bayley Abrams. Nara Abrams, Bayley's mother, is the founder and president of Imagine a Cure for Leukemia.

"Bayley is an amazing child with big ideas. She also has a great group of friends who wanted to help," Abrams said. "For the past few years, Bayley has asked her friends to donate to the charity in lieu of birthday gifts. This year, however, she said she wanted to do more, and the Camp Imagine project was born."

Bayley and 17 of her friends ages eight through 13 were on the Camp Imagine volunteer committee. They met for several months to plan the event, to write donation request letters and to approach donors.

Seventeen camps participated. They are Walden, Robin Hood, Manitou, Timberlane, Bayview Glen, Westcoast Connection, Active Kids Zone, the Jack & Pat Kay Centre, Adventure Valley, Elite Basketball, Wahonowin, Zodiac, Winnebago, Crestwood Valley, Tamakwa, Tamarack and White Pine.

The Camp Imagine volunteer committee [Sylman Photography]

Each camp had its own booth at the event featuring an activity for children, and there was also a tuck shop with snacks, a raffle, a camp social hosted by Sole Power Productions and a live performance by rising star Sydney Bernkopf. The venue, food and entertainment were all donated.

One of the activities at Camp Imagine was at the letter-writing station. "When children go to overnight camp they write letters to their families," Bayley said. "I thought it would be very special to write a letter to kids who are ill at the SickKids Hospital."

The afternoon concluded with campers gathering for a bonfire where the official Camp Imagine song was showcased. The song was written by 10-year-old Jayden Shnier, who is on the Camp Imagine volunteer committee.

Mark Diamond, owner and director of Camp Manitou, said that "to create a 'camp for the day' in the city for such an important and significant cause is simply brilliant. To have an event for kids, run by kids, to help find a cure for a disease that, unfortunately, in some way, touches us all, allows us to empower our youth in the best possible way."

Abrams said her late mom, Miriam Segal, was her inspiration. "I was touched by her optimism when she was diagnosed with leukemia. Every time we have an event, we honour people we know that are fighting this disease, and in the memory of my mom and grandfather.

"We raised $80,000 at our first gala back in 2006, and our fundraising initiatives have since expanded. To date we have raised $800,000 for leukemia research."

Abrams added that the group's goal for Camp Imagine was not just to raise funds but also to encourage kids to get involved with philanthropy and to continue raising awareness of leukemia. "It was inspiring to watch the future generation," she said.

The Leukemia & Lymphoma Society of Canada says that this year 5,600 Canadians will be diagnosed with leukemia and 2,600 will die from it. Leukemia is the most common pediatric cancer affecting those age 19 and under.

"The funds raised by Camp Imagine will be used to fund lifesaving cancer research. We want cures today, not someday. That's the goal. The commitment from Imagine a Cure for Leukemia has truly brought us closer to a world without cancer," said Andrea Swinton, executive director of the Leukemia & Lymphoma Society of Canada, Ontario region.

Home workers and volunteers

Helping people live until they die

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Doctors and nurses who work in hospitals and hospices are crucial members of the teams that help terminally ill patients live out their lives in relative comfort and dignity.

Social workers are also an important part of palliative care in these settings, for both patients and their families.

But often overlooked are the trained volunteers and paid workers who go out into the community to look after people who choose to remain at home for the length of their illnesses.

Arshag Tokmanian

Virginia Clark Weir is a clinical nurse who works out of the Freeman Centre for Palliative Care at North York General Hospital. The 13-year-old centre mostly provides medical and social work services to patients in their homes (but it also does so on a more limited, acute in-patient basis).

"Our role is to help people live until they die. We help them take control of their own lives," Clark Weir said.

"We visited one gentleman for 2-1/2 years. He had complications, but with our involvement, together with his family's support, we were able to help him a great deal," she said.

"We can't predict when [there is going to be a crisis], but we can always be called upon. We're also there for the caregivers. It is often a devastating experience for them, and we try to focus on them as well.

"We try to help each patient and caregiver with the most ideal way to manage care."

About 95 per cent of the centre's patients want to remain at home, she said, but there are six beds in the hospital's palliative care unit that are reserved for dying patients or those who need to have their treatment reassessed.

"We do have the ability to transfer patients from their home on an urgent basis. If patients are under the Freeman Centre umbrella, seamless care is carried on."

Clark Weir said she finds her work rewarding and challenging.

"We work with patients and families who are moving through uncharted territories, and they feel very vulnerable. We can take them to the next step, and teach them about their new normal. This takes away the fear, and they don't feel alone.

Palliative Care

Third of a 3-part series

"I [in turn] have learned a great deal from some very courageous people. It is humbling to be involved with them."

Arshag Tokmanian, 78, whose wife, Shoushan, was a patient of the Freeman Centre – she died about 1-1/2 years ago – said that when he brought his wife home after a two-month stay in the hospital, they received home care from the Freeman Centre.

"They not only helped her, they helped me. Their philosophy is to support the caregiver as well. They talked to me and helped boost my morale."

When Clark Weir determined that caring for his wife was beyond his capacity, Tokmanian said, Shoushan was transferred back to the hospital.

"I was so satisfied and touched by the whole process that I have become a volunteer for the hospital. I'm happy to be able to tell them 'Thank you' in my own way," he said.

Beverley Schachter and Lisa Kronenberg, are social workers who work in Jewish Family & Child's Jewish hospice program, the only culturally specific hospice program in the Toronto area. The inter-agency program is also served by Circle of Care, which recruits and trains the volunteers who do hospice home visits.

JF&CS provides case management for Jewish clients, while Circle of Care provides volunteers, as well as case management for non-Jewish clients.

Through JF&CS, Schachter said, caregivers are linked to an array of services, including spiritual care with Rabbi Ronald Weiss, JF&CS' director of chaplaincy services. "We help build a safety net, which could include six or seven organizations, plus the volunteers from Circle of Care," she said.

"At a time like this, caregivers' resources become stretched. We provide care for them as well. Our huge counselling piece gives respite to the caregivers."

She said that while UJA Federation of Greater Toronto funds the bulk of the hospice program, United Way funds the counselling.

Kronenberg said the program supports the needs of young people and older people. "An illness robs people of their control. We try to help them get back that control and to validate all their accomplishments."

Lysa Springer, manager of volunteer programs at Circle of Care, says the agency's volunteer hospice care efforts aim to help keep clients at home. "Our volunteers provide a specialized service."

They undergo 32 hours of training, she said, covering such topics as communication, grief and bereavement, and care for the caregiver. "Before a volunteer visits a patient, we ensure that they are empowered, and have the tools they need. Ongoing training is also mandatory."

Springer said volunteers also provide relief for caregivers, and may do some shopping, as well as accompany patients and caregivers to appointments or do some light laundry. "Volunteers are there up to four hours a week."

Elizabeth Mintoft-Cohen volunteers with the program because she has always liked working with people in challenging situations.

"I like being able to advocate for them. Caring for family members can be difficult, and when caregivers feel it is becoming too much for them, I let them know they are not failures. I am there to support their decisions."

During one particularly poignant visit, she said, Rabbi Weiss dropped in with electric Shabbat candles. "Lighting the candles with the patient made her feel so good. It helped her get through a rough day."

Alan Shimmerman began volunteering, he said, after he was approached by another male volunteer. "He gave me so many reasons why I should do it, and I went for it.

"It has been an incredible experience for me. I went through the program, and I was enlightened by each topic. One topic that moved me was 'loss.' I thought about what the client was losing , and I thought that I could add something to the client's life.

"I knew I had made a difference when one of my clients called and said that his friend had arrived from out of town, and he wanted me to meet him."

Elizabeth Mintoft-Cohen, left, Lysa Springer and Alan Shimmerman

Shimmerman said that it's difficult to describe how special his volunteer work is.

"We have had laughs and fun times. I am there for the person in a different way than everyone else. I'm not their caregiver or their family," he said.

"It is an honour for me to [share their lives] and make their journey an easier one."

Sonia W.'s mother received home palliative care through a hospice program for six months before Sonia would even talk about it.

"I couldn't admit it to myself or to anyone else, because if I said it out loud, it meant my mother was dying."

Ironically, her mother, who died a year ago, thrived as a result of visits by the volunteer. "She looked forward to them and would talk about it from the moment she woke up."

It was the volunteer who finally convinced Sonia to embrace the palliative care philosophy, said Sonia, who lived with her mother throughout her illness.

"She made me realize that my mother was so much more comfortable at home than in an acute care ward of a hospital. We didn't have to spend hours on end in the emergency rooms waiting to be seen," Sonia said.

"[The volunteer] also became my friend. I could talk to her without feeling I was being a burden, because that is exactly why she was there."

Sonia said that it didn't take her long to realize that the volunteers are "special people. They came in and made us feel that we were not alone. Sometimes I would take a short nap while they visited. She convinced me that I needed to take care of myself. I was of no use to my mother if I wasn't well."

When Rabbi Elyse Goldstein made her first trip to Guatemala in 2009, she and her travelling companions were hesitant about spending Shabbat with Casa Hillel, a small liberal Jewish community they found on the Internet.

"We were all intrigued by this fledgling Jewish organization, but frankly, we were a little nervous," recalled the rabbi. "We had heard through the grapevine that this congregation wasn't Jewish and perhaps even messianic. Nothing was further from the truth. They were very sincere and struggling to become Reform Jews."

Fast forward four years to February 2013, and their struggle ended when Rabbi Goldstein and two other rabbis officiated at the formal conversion of the Casa Hillel congregants.

"Nothing could emotionally prepare me for this transformative weekend," Rabbi Goldstein said.

She will be giving a slide-show presentation on this unique community at 7:30 p.m. on March 17, at the Wolfond Centre in Toronto. This event is co-sponsored by City Shul, the new Reform congregation founded by Rabbi Goldstein, and the diversity committee of Congregation Darchei Noam.

Rabbi Goldstein was accompanied on the conversion mission by Rabbi Ruth Abusch-Magder, executive director of Be' chol Lashon, a California-based organization that promotes Jewish diversity worldwide, and Rabbi Claudio Kogan, a Spanish-speaking rabbi and mohel from Argentina who is now based in Texas.

Rabbi Goldstein said that a private donor financed their trip. They made up the three-member beit din that oversaw the conversion of 19 people – 12 men and seven women.

She pointed out that these congregants did not get any special treatment. "They took a written exam, the same one everyone takes when they convert."

Rabbi Claudio Kogan, centre, assists Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, left, as she blesses newly converted Guatemalan congregant Dina Hernandez.

The congregation has formally adopted the name Adat Israel: Asociación Judía Reformista de Guatemala. "Our application to the World Union for Progressive Judaism was accepted, giving us recognition as Guatemala's official Reform congregation," Rabbi Goldstein said.

And she will continue to be the congregational rabbi. It's a volunteer position she took on shortly after her first encounter with the community back in 2009.

Since then, Rabbi Goldstein has visited the community eight times for prayer and study, but she calls herself a "long-distance rabbi," because much of her teaching has been done on Skype. She also arranged for the group to study on Skype with a Spanish-speaking rabbi.

By the end of 2012, many of the congregants were ready for their conversion and a February date was set for what the rabbi described as an intensive weekend of ceremonial events.

"Following the written exam, the congregants learned to chant Torah," Rabbi Goldstein said. "Three of them did it for the first time ever at the Shabbat morning service."

The group studied together until Havdalah and later, each person went before the beit din to be questioned "on their sincerity and their knowledge." She stressed that the beit din did not pass everyone. "Some people were not ready. Those that didn't pass are willing to wait another year."

The following morning, Rabbi Kogan performed the hatafat dam brit on the 12 male congregants, a procedure that was strictly ceremonial, because the men had already had hospital circumcisions. Afterward, the members went to the mikvah. Rabbi Goldstein said that the congregation did not have ready access to a community mikvah, so everyone drove to a nearby natural mountain thermal pool.

That same evening the whole community went back to the shul, where three couples were married under a chupah.

The highlight of the weekend was the pre-mikvah service, says Rabbi Goldstein. "That morning, the congregants stood as all Jews stood at Sinai and received the Torah. With a sefer Torah dressed in Guatemalan fabric in front of the room, and the three rabbis as witness, they sang Shema Yisrael…

"They sang Ozi v' zimrat Yah with full hearts and tears streaming down their eyes. All I can say is, the Jewish People are blessed with groups like these. They speak the language of Divine calling. It's a language I understand fluently."

Passover Food Ideas

Make your dinner sweeter with matzah

Judy Bart Kancigor
Special to The CJN

Poor us. No bread for a week.

During Passover we eat matzah, the poor bread that sustained our ancestors in the desert, and we call it the "bread of affliction" to remember that once we were slaves in Egypt. But miraculously God led us into freedom, enabling us to create a glorious celebration around it, using our ingenuity, skill, traditions and collective memory. To focus on what we do without for those eight days is to see the glass half empty.

We Jews sure love a challenge, and imaginative Jewish cooks through the ages, like a million Iron Chefs all working with the same surprise ingredient, have moulded, crumbled, whipped, layered, fried, baked, infused and combined matzah and its ground-up cousins with an astonishing variety of other ingredients to produce a tempting feast. The fact that we base a glorious celebration on the "bread of affliction" illustrates that we have the freedom to do so.

Matzah is one of the few "Jewish foods" that we actually invented. (Cholent is another.) Strict rabbinical rules govern every aspect of its production. I asked David Rossi, vice-president of marketing for RAB Food Group, owners of the Manischewitz brand, to explain the Passover manufacturing process.

"From the time water touches the flour and gets mixed, then sheeted, made thinner and thinner, to the end of baking in the oven, can be no longer than 18 minutes," he said. "If there is a mechanical failure or some issue or error where the matzah did not get through that run in 18 minutes, then the whole run must be thrown away."

Before the company can begin production for Passover, the entire facility must be thoroughly cleaned and inspected – a procedure that makes my grandmother's fastidious weeklong scouring seem like a light dusting.

"The process takes four to seven weeks," Rossi noted. "All the belts, lines, motors and ovens are cleaned and kashered to meet strict rabbinical standards for Passover."

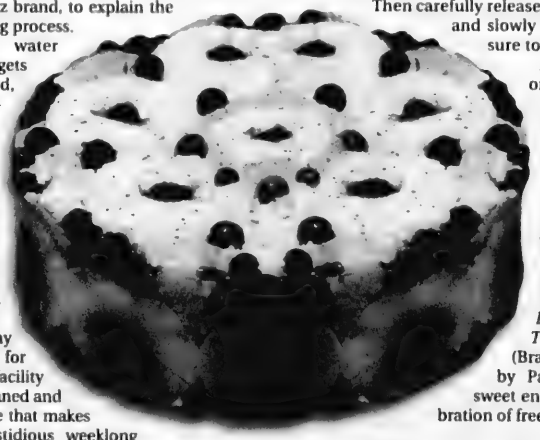
Turning out hundreds of Passover items is no overnighter. "We begin making Passover products in September until early March for the following year," he said. "Because the plant is kashered at tremendous expense, we produce Passover products until we've run all the requirements for the year. Then, in March, we start making non-Passover products."

Apple-Apricot Matzah Schalat (the word derives from cholent and has nothing to do with the "charlotte" pudding of French cuisine) is my family's favourite kugel, awaited eagerly each year. Sure, you can bake it in a 13 x 9-inch pan, as the recipe states, but if you really want to impress, try my knock-their-socks-off presentation using a springform pan.

I've been making this kugel for as long as I can remember. Several years ago, Natalie Haughton, food editor of the Los Angeles Daily News, came to my home with a photographer to interview me for a Passover feature story. She suggested that instead of using a 13x9-in. pan, I bake my schalat in a springform pan, and the result is amazing: pineapple rings with strawberry centres encircle this fruity kugel, studded with blueberries and mandarin oranges for a rainbow of colour too pretty to cut.

If you want to try it, here's how: generously grease the bottom and sides of a 10-in. springform pan. (If you have only a 9-in. springform pan, you will have some batter left over, which you can bake separately in a small dish.) Dry the pineapple, berries and mandarin oranges well with paper towels so they will stick. Press pineapple rings carefully onto the greased sides of the pan. Press strawberries into the centre of each pineapple ring, facing the tips outward. Press mandarin oranges and blueberries artfully into the spaces between the pineapple rings. If any of the fruit refuses to stick, use a bit more shortening as "glue."

Slowly pour the matzah mixture into the pan, being careful not to disturb the fruit sticking to the sides. Decorate the top with more fruit. Dot it with the slivers of margarine and sprinkle with cinnamon. You may have to bake it a little longer, about 1-1/4 hours, until the centre is firm. Allow the schalat to rest, covered, for 10 minutes. Then carefully release the spring mechanism and slowly lift the sides away. Be sure to take a bow!



Any lingering thoughts on the restrictions of Passover are quickly dispelled by dessert. Every family has its favourite sponge cake, homemade macaroons and other tasty recipes, but sometimes the simplest is the best – Marble Chocolate Matzah from The Kosher Baker: Over 160 Dairy-free Recipes from Traditional to Trendy (Brandeis University Press) by Paula Shoyer brings a sweet ending to our sweet celebration of freedom. Chag Samayach!

APPLE-APRICOT MATZAH SCHALAT

nondairy margarine or butter, for greasing the pan
1 cup (packed) dried apricots, snipped, or golden raisins, or a combination
2 cans (20 oz. each) pineapple rings, drained, juice reserved
9 boards matzah
6 medium-size apples, peeled and thinly sliced
9 large eggs, separated
1 1/2 cups sugar
grated zest of 1 lemon juice of 1 lemon (about 3 tbsp.)
1 tbsp. ground cinnamon, plus extra for sprinkling
1 1/2 tsp. vanilla (see note)
1/2 tsp. salt
6 tbsp. (3/4 stick) nondairy margarine or butter, melted and cooled
2 cups fresh strawberries about 1 cup fresh blueberries
1 can (11 oz.) mandarin oranges
3 tbsp. nondairy margarine or butter, slivered

Preheat the oven to 350. Generously grease a 13x9-in. baking pan

Combine snipped apricots and/or raisins and reserved pineapple juice in small bowl, and set aside.

Crumble matzah into a very large bowl, add cold water to cover, and soak a few seconds just to soften. Drain thoroughly, wipe bowl dry, and return matzah to bowl. Toss in apple slices.

Beat egg whites on medium-high speed until soft peaks form. Gradually add 3/4 cup sugar until stiff peaks form. Transfer whites to clean bowl and set aside.

Beat egg yolks and remaining 3/4 cup of the sugar (no need to wash bowl) with electric mixer on medium-high speed until thick and lemon-coloured, scraping bowl as necessary. Beat in lemon zest and juice, cinnamon, vanilla and salt. Stir in cooled melted margarine.

Stir egg yolk mixture into matzah. Drain apricots and add to matzah. Combine well. Stir one fourth of egg whites into matzah mixture to lighten. Fold in remaining whites in three additions until incorporated.

Pour matzah mixture into prepared pan. Decorate top with pineapple rings, strawberries, blueberries and mandarin oranges in a pretty design. Dot with slivers of margarine; sprinkle with cinnamon. Bake, uncovered until firm, about 1 hour. Cut into squares and serve hot. Serves about 18

MARBLE CHOCOLATE MATZAH

Paula Shoyer elevates an old favourite to its crunchiest, most elegant best.

1/3 cup slivered almonds, toasted and chopped
10 oz. pareve dark bittersweet chocolate, chopped or broken into 1-in pieces
1/3 cup pareve white chocolate chips
3 large or 4 small pieces of matzah

Melt dark chocolate and white chocolate in separate bowls over simmering water. Mix nuts into melted dark chocolate.

Line 1 large or 2 smaller cookie sheets with waxed paper and place matzahs on top. Spread warm dark chocolate and nut mixture all over matzah slices to cover entirely on one side.

Drop clumps of warm melted white chocolate randomly on top of dark chocolate. Use toothpick to swirl chocolates to create a marble effect. Refrigerate to set 1 hour and then break into pieces to serve. Serves 12.

As easy as pie

Randy Fingrut
Special to The CJN

"It could be argued that there is an element of entertainment in every pie, as every pie is inherently a surprise by virtue of its crust," Janet Clarkson writes in Pie: A Global History.

This Passover, pie is the new cupcake. You can't have your fingers in too many pies. Pies bring back nostalgic memories of time spent with family and friends while paying homage to the seasons. Pies can be prepared either sweet or savoury, with an endless variety of fillings and toppings.

Baking pies is a much less fussy endeavour than baking and assembling cupcakes. And a pie provides more of a homey feel to any meal in a way that cupcakes just can't. Remember, promises and pie crusts are made to be broken.

In addition, Passover pies are some of the best around. Although the ingredients in Passover pies are nothing unusual, they yield high quality and addictive pies. They also make everything better.

LEMON PIE WIH CANDIED LEMON SLICES

Candied Lemon Slices
1 large lemon
1/4 to 1/3 cup sugar

Preheat the oven to 275. Cover a baking sheet with parchment paper. Slice lemon crosswise into slices approximately one-eighth of an inch thick. Place the lemon slices flat on top of the parchment in a single layer. Sprinkle sugar evenly over the surface of the lemon slices.

Bake lemon slices for 50 to 60 minutes, or until the slices appear to be nearly dried and the candy glaze has hardened. Remove baking sheet from the oven and then use an offset spatula to gently loosen them from the parchment. Cool candied lemon slices completely before using as garnish. If made ahead, keep refrigerated.

Sweet Pie Crust
2-1/2 cups finely ground walnuts
1/2 cup matzah meal
1/3 cup plus 1 tbsp. margarine or butter
1/4 cup sugar
2 tbsp. lemon zest

Preheat oven to 350. Combine all ingredients. Mixture should hold together. In a 9-inch Pyrex pie plate, pat the mixture into bottom of the dish and up around the sides. With two fingers, pinch the edges evenly around edge of the dish, making a pattern. Bake for 20-25 minutes. Watch it carefully so it will not brown too much, as nuts burn very quickly. Remove from oven and allow to cool to room temperature before filling.

Filling
1/3 cup fresh lemon juice
2 tbsp. lemon zest
1/2 cup sugar
3 egg yolks
1/8 tsp. salt
1/3 cup margarine, melted
1 cup whipping cream

In a heavy saucepan, combine lemon juice, zest, sugar, yolks, salt and margarine. On medium heat, stir mixture with a whisk continually until mixture reaches a boil and thickens. Remove from heat and cool.

Whip cream to soft peaks and gently fold into the cooled lemon mixture. Spread over pie crust. Garnish with candied lemon slices. Keep refrigerated.

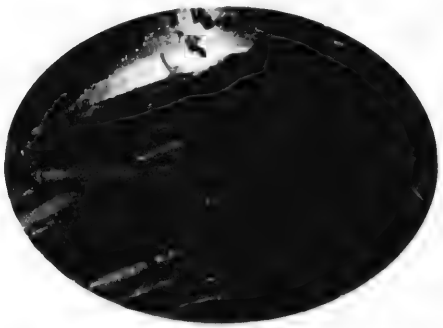
Delicious midweek meal

Mollie Katzen
JNS.org

While planning what to cook to feed the whole family on Passover's big seder night, it's easy to forget to plan your meals for the rest of the holiday week. Suddenly, lo and behold, you find yourself staring at the wide-open cupboard with nothing but matzah staring back at you.

But not to worry! With the right preparation, you can still eat a decent meal.

ASPARAGUS-FETA FRITTATA



Asparagus are the emblematic spring vegetable, and Passover is the spring holiday. Eggs are another seasonal symbol, so combine them all and get a tasty meal from the delicious mix.

2 to 3 tbsp. olive oil
1 cup finely minced onion
4 medium stalks asparagus, trimmed of the tough ends, peeled if desired, and sliced into thin (1/8-in.) diagonal coins
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. dried tarragon
1 tsp. minced garlic
8 large eggs
freshly ground black pepper
4 oz. feta cheese

Place a 10-in. skillet with an ovenproof handle over medium heat for about 2 minutes. Add 1 tablespoon of the olive oil, wait about 10 seconds, then swirl to coat the pan. Add the onion and sauté for about 5 minutes, or until softened. Stir in the asparagus, salt, tarragon and garlic, cook for about 3 minutes or until the asparagus are tender-crisp and remove from the heat.

Break the eggs into a large bowl and beat well with a whisk. Add the sautéed vegetables, grind in some black pepper, crumble in the cheese and stir until blended. Clean and dry the skillet and return it to the stove over medium heat. Preheat the broiler.

When the skillet is hot again, add the remaining 1 to 2 tbsp. olive oil, wait about 30 seconds, and swirl to coat the pan. Pour in the vegetable-egg mixture and let it cook undisturbed over medium heat for 3 to 4 minutes, or until the eggs are set on the bottom.

Transfer the skillet to the preheated broiler, and broil for about 3 minutes, or until the frittata is firm in the centre. Remove the pan from the broiler and run a rubber spatula around the edge to loosen the frittata. Slide or invert it onto a large, round plate, and serve hot, warm or at room temperature, cut into wedges. Yield: 4 to 6 servings.

Lots of variety available at Pesach

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

When I was a child, my mother served sponge cake for breakfast during Passover. It's one of my fondest childhood memories of the holiday. My mother didn't allow us to eat much sugar, so eating cake for breakfast was the ultimate treat. The marble sponge cake was my favourite.

Of course, when I was growing up, Passover food options were pretty limited. Nowadays there are an incredible number of specialty items available for the holiday.

I love trolling the supermarket aisles and checking out all the latest Passover foods. There are sauces and dressings of all kinds and desserts galore. The stores even carry balsamic vinegar and olive oil from Italy.

You can get at least 10-different types of matzah – organic, whole wheat, multigrain. There's even gluten-free matzah. It's kosher for Passover, but it can't be used for sacramental purposes, because according to Halachah, matzah must be made from one or more of five grains – wheat, rye, oats, barley and spelt, all of which contain gluten.

This year, I decided to try some new recipes based on Passover products I found on the store shelves. I have always been curious about the sweet and sour chicken and duck sauces. They have different names, depending on the brands, but these sauces are all basically the same. They're made from peaches, apricots, sugar, vinegar and spices.

The sauces can have varying degrees of spiciness and are usually used for chicken. But I decided to try one of the sweet and sour sauces on brisket. I also added onion soup, cooking wine, ketchup and jam, all products with kosher for Passover hechshers. My brisket recipe got thumbs up from my kids, so I will be making it for the second seder.

My family also liked a teriyaki chicken recipe made with imitation kosher for Passover teriyaki sauce. It's not really festive enough for a seder. But it's quick and simple to make and perfect for chol hamoed.

BRISKET WITH SWEET AND SOUR SAUCE

5 to 6 lb. beef brisket
2 cups sweet and sour chicken or duck sauce
1/2 cup red cooking wine
1 cup water
1 package dry onion soup mix
1/2 cup ketchup
1/2 cup apricot jam
Preheat oven to 325.

Place brisket fat side up in a large roasting pan. In a large bowl combine sweet and sour sauce, wine, water and soup mix and mix well. Pour sauce over brisket. In a small bowl make a paste of the ketchup and jam and spread it on the top of the brisket. Cover roast with aluminum foil so the sides of the pan are well-sealed. Cook in preheated oven for four hours or until the roast is tender.

Separate the brisket from the sauce and refrigerate overnight. Skim any fat in sauce. Cut the roast against the grain in thin slices. Return meat to roasting pan. Pour the sauce over the meat and cover with foil. Place in oven at 350 for 40 minutes. Serve warm. Makes 5-6 servings.

TERIYAKI GINGER CHICKEN

3/4 lb. chicken breast cutlets
2 tbsp. olive oil
3 cloves garlic, peeled and sliced
1-2 tbsp. grated fresh ginger sea salt to taste (optional)
4 tbsp. kosher for Passover imitation teriyaki sauce
2 green onions, sliced, for garnish (optional)

Cut chicken cutlets in half so they are about 2 inches wide and set aside. Pour olive oil and 2 tbsp. teriyaki sauce in a large frying pan on medium heat. Add garlic and cook for 3 minutes. Add ginger. Cook another minute.

Add chicken, cook for 4 minutes on 1 side and flip. Season with salt. Add remainder of teriyaki sauce. Cook another four minutes or until chicken breast is no longer pink inside. To serve, place chicken on a plate. Pour remainder of sauce over the top, but discard the ginger and garlic. Garnish chicken with green onions. Makes 4 servings.

Norene Gilletz
Special to The CJN

With a little creativity and a few basic ingredients, you can prepare all sorts of scrumptious side dishes for Passover that will be impressive enough to take centre stage. But don't just limit yourself to potatoes – there's a whole wide world of colourful vegetables to choose from.

The fresh vegetable section in most supermarkets is overflowing with an amazing rainbow of produce, from A to Z, from asparagus to zucchini. Fresh veggies are nutritious, packed with vitamins and offer up fabulous flavour. As an added bonus, homemade side dishes are much more affordable than packaged mixes and prepared side dishes, especially if you're cooking for a crowd. The trick is to choose recipes that require simple preparation.

Here are some recipes for scrumptious side dishes that were shared by several of my foodie-friends – I call them my "pan pals." Even though we live in different cities, we're connected to each other by our love of good food. Their recipes are uncomplicated to prepare, taste terrific and will definitely impress the guests at your Passover table. Enjoy!

Leah Schapira, the author of Fresh & Easy Kosher Cooking, is the founder of CookKosher.com, a wonderful online recipe exchange. Leah teamed up with food editor Victoria Dwek to create Passover Made Easy (Artscroll/Shaar Press), which was published just in time for Passover. This creative cookbook delivers 60 triple-tested recipes for every day of the holiday week, with a full-colour photo for each recipe.

"For a recipe to earn a spot, we really had to love it," said Leah. And it had to be easy enough too."

Victoria added: "For every recipe that made it into this book, there were three that didn't."

Leah wrote: "This kugel recipe was inspired by CookKosher.com... it redeemed spaghetti squash for her. She had tried a few recipes using this unique squash before but had never really loved how they came out. She almost gave up before this kugel emerged from the oven. Spaghetti Squash Kugel is cool because it looks like noodle kugel, but is actually very low in calories. You can make it even lighter by replacing some of the yolks with whites."

SPAGHETTI SQUASH KUGEL

Adapted from Passover Made Easy by Leah Schapira and Victoria Dwek

1 spaghetti squash
1 tbsp. oil
2 onions, finely diced
1 garlic clove, minced
4 eggs, lightly beaten
1/2 tsp. salt
1 tsp. coarse black pepper

Preheat oven to 350. Wash spaghetti squash and place into a loaf pan. Bake for 1 hour. Remove from oven and let cool. Raise oven heat to 400. (For microwave instructions, see "Nuke it," below.)

Slice squash in half and remove seeds. Using a fork, scrape the strands of squash into a large bowl.

Heat oil in a sauté pan over medium heat. Add onions and garlic. Sauté until onions are soft, 5-7 minutes. Add onions to spaghetti squash. Add eggs, salt and pepper. Pour mixture into a 9x13-in. baking pan. Bake until kugel is crispy on top, about 1 hour. Makes 6 (or more) servings.

Nuke It! For quicker preparation, microwave a whole spaghetti squash for 1 minute to soften. Slice in half and remove seeds. Place cut side down in a dish with 1/2 inch of water. Microwave it for 8-10 minutes. Continue with Step 2.

Tidbit: Even though we often bake it in square pans nowadays, the word "kugel" may stem from the Hebrew "k'iygul" (as a circle), referring to its traditionally round shape.

Cookbook author Pam Reiss works in the family business, Desserts Plus, a kosher catering and food store in Winnipeg. Passover – a Kosher Collection, is the second in the series of Kosher Collection cookbooks. Her website is www.pamelareiss.com.

"Passover cooking can be stressful," Pam says. "For some families Passover is about the recipes that have been passed down for generations, while others like to experiment with new dishes. There are wonderful memories linked to all of the traditional recipes that my grandmothers and parents have passed down to me. My desire for traditional foods is in constant battle with the enjoyment I get from trying new things. A good compromise is to stick with traditional foods for the seders and try new recipes during chol hamoed."

Pam continues: "If I had to choose (and it would be hard to decide), I think this might be my favourite kugel. Button and crimini mushrooms often get the short end of the stick, but I love them and this kugel shows them off."

PASSOVER MUSHROOM AND ONION FARFEL KUGEL

Adapted from Passover – A Kosher Collection by Pam Reiss

4 tbsp. olive oil
1 lb. yellow onions, peeled and diced small (2 medium)
2 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. black pepper
1 1/2 lb. (button or crimini mushrooms, sliced
1 1/2 cups water
8 oz. package farfel (4 cups)
6 large eggs, lightly beaten

Preheat the oven to 375. Place a large frying pan or a pot over medium-high heat and add the olive oil. Add the onions, salt and pepper and cook, stirring, for 8-10 minutes or until soft and golden brown.

Add the mushrooms and cook another 6-8 minutes, or until they've all cooked and have shrunk by about half. We're not trying to brown the mushrooms at all, just cook them.

Add the water and bring to a simmer. Cook for 1 minute.

Put the farfel in a large mixing bowl. Pour the mushroom/onion mixture over the farfel and stir to mix. Let rest for about half an hour or until cooled completely and most of the liquid has been absorbed.

Once cooled, add the eggs and stir to combine. Pour the batter into a greased 8x11-in. pan. Bake for 45 minutes or until golden brown and firm. Makes 8 servings.

Esther Deutsch is the author of Chic Made Simple: Fresh Fast Fabulous Kosher Cuisine. She is a New York-based food stylist, columnist and recipe developer, and the food editor of Ami magazine. Esther has a theory that if your food looks irresistible, it tastes irresistible. She is a self-taught cook who has never taken a single culinary class. Esther's recipes are super easy to prepare, but always delicious, impressive and imaginative. If she can do it, anyone can – effortlessly.

Esther writes: "This original Pesach creation is my mother's. It's been given out to many, who have made it a year-round addition to their menus. For a savoury variation, substitute the sweet potatoes with sautéed mushrooms and onions, or for an innovative twist on shepherd's pie, with sautéed minced meat and onions."

POTATO KUGEL AND SWEET POTATO ROULADE

Adapted from Chic Made Simple by Esther Deutsch

Sweet Potato Mash:
3 sweet potatoes, peels intact
1 medium onion, diced
3 tbsp. oil
kosher salt

Potato Kugel Mixture:
5 large potatoes, peeled and grated
3 eggs
2 tbsp. oil
1 tbsp. kosher salt
white pepper

To prepare sweet potato mash: Preheat oven to 350. Roast sweet potatoes, uncovered, until soft, about 1 1/2 hours.

Meanwhile, in a skillet, heat 3 tbsp. of oil. Sauté onion in oil over medium heat, until soft and translucent, about 8 minutes. Remove sweet potatoes from the oven and slice them in half. Scoop out the flesh, discard peels, and mash. Combine mashed sweet potatoes with sautéed onions and season with kosher salt.

To prepare potato kugel mixture: In a bowl, combine grated potatoes, eggs, oil, salt and white pepper. Line a cookie sheet with parchment paper and spread potato mixture evenly over parchment paper. Bake, uncovered, until top of mixture is firm, about 30 minutes. Remove from oven and let cool for 5 minutes. Roll potato kugel, jelly-roll style, together with parchment paper. Allow to cool completely.

To assemble, unroll potato kugel. Spread mashed sweet potato evenly over kugel. Roll again, this time pulling away parchment paper to form a potato kugel roll (unrolling and rerolling is essential – it helps to maintain the shape of the roll. Serve warm. Makes 8 servings

Barbara Rolek is the guide for eastern European food on www.about.com and we've become "virtual friends" even though we've never met. So what's a nice Catholic girl doing writing about Jewish food? Well, she comes by it honestly. She explains, "I am Jewish by osmosis and proud of it! I inherited the gene from my mother, who cleaned houses and served meals for some of the Jewish ladies in our ethnically diverse neighbourhood and developed an affinity for Jewish cuisine. That's where my mom learned about matzah ball soup so rich with schmaltz, it tasted like bubbie's. To this day, I'm the best matzah-ball maker in the family, my brother's rugelach are to die for and my sister takes top honours for her cheese blintzes."

This carrot ring recipe is made with grated carrots and is "grate" for Passover! It makes a great side dish for beef brisket or apricot-baked chicken.

PASSOVER CARROT RING

Prep time 30 minutes, cooking time 35 minutes

1 cup brown sugar
1 1/2 cups oil
4 large eggs, separated (use 5 eggs if you omit baking soda)
3 cups shredded carrots
2 cups matzah meal
1 tsp. Passover baking soda (optional)
1 tsp. salt
3 tbsp. cold water
2 tsp. lemon juice

Heat oven to 300. Lightly coat a medium ring mould with cooking spray.

In a large bowl, cream brown sugar and oil. Beat in egg yolks and carrots.

In a separate bowl, whisk together matzah meal, baking soda (if using) and salt. Add to carrot mixture, mixing well. Add water and lemon juice and combine thoroughly.

In a separate bowl, beat egg whites until stiff but not dry, and stir 1/3 of the whites into the carrot mixture to lighten it. Then, fold in remaining whites, trying not to deflate the volume. Pour mixture into prepared mould. Bake 15 minutes at 300. Raise heat to 375 and bake an additional 20 minutes. Let cool 15 minutes before unmoulding. Makes 8 servings.

A call was put out to CJN cooks to submit some of their favourite Passover recipes. Some recipes are original, and others have been adapted from other sources.

Submitted by Gloria Clamen:

CARROT KUGEL MUFFINS

6 carrots
1/2 cup orange juice
2 eggs
3/4 cup oil
1 cup cake meal
pinch salt
1/2 cup sugar
1/2 tsp. Passover baking powder

Grease muffin tins very, very well with cooking spray (batter tends to stick).

Preheat oven to 350. In a food processor, grate peeled carrots. Add rest of ingredients one at a time. Process just until well combined. Bake for 30-35 min. until set. Take out of oven and let rest until slightly cool. Carefully take out of muffin tins by running a knife around edge of each muffin; turn muffin tin upside down onto cooling rack. Freezes well or serve same day.

For seder, triple the recipe. They're gone before you know it!

GRANNY MEHR'S TZIMMES

Source: Kinnereth Cookbook, (Hadassah-WIZO) Toronto

This recipe is a guest and family favourite, and earns rave reviews. It's delicious. Don't let the multiple steps discourage you. The end result is well worth it. It keeps for several days and can be a meal in itself, as well as a side dish, and improves with age

3 lbs. flanken
2 onions, sliced
5 lb.carrots
5 sweet potatoes
1-1/2 cups brown sugar
1 tbsp. salt
8 large potatoes, peeled
2 eggs
salt to taste
2 tbsp. oil

Preheat oven to 350. In a large roasting pan, place flanken and onions and pour in some water, just to cover. Bake for 1 hour.

Peel carrots. In food processor with thin slicing blade, or by hand, slice carrots; pour over flanken and onions. Cook covered for 1 hour.

Add peeled, quartered sweet potatoes, salt and brown sugar. Bake another hour (This can be done in advance and refrigerated).

Continue with final recipe step, or next day, in 350-degree oven reheat tzimmes while preparing potato topping.

(This part is like making potato latke batter). Peel and grate potatoes in food processor. Drain starch. Add salt, eggs and oil. Spoon over tzimmes and bake for 1-1/2 hrs. until well browned. Simply add a little water each time before reheating. Serves 12.

FLANKEN

Place flanken strips in a Dutch oven (covered roasting pan).

Slice potatoes and place on top of flanken. A little sweet red wine is optional and a little onion soup powder and/or pepper sprinkled over the flanken is optional.

Pour generous amount of duck sauce over (it calls for 1/2 jar, but I used less). Bake at 350 for 1/2 hour covered. Continue baking at 250 for 2 hours.

RIKEE'S CAULIFLOWER KUGEL (QUICHE)

Boil 1 head of cauliflower until it gets soft. Mash it (it mashes easily with a fork).

Add two eggs, 1/4 cup mayonnaise, 1-2 tbsp. onion soup powder, and bake at 350 for 40 minutes. Light and yummy.

VALERIE'S PESACH LEMON MERINGUE

5 egg yolks
1 1/4 cups sugar
2 cups pareve whipping cream
3/4 cup lemon juice
lemon zest, optional
5 egg whites
1/4 cup sugar

In a small bowl, using an electric or hand-held mixer, beat yolks until thick and creamy. Add sugar. Continue beating until light yellow.

In another bowl, whip cream. Add lemon juice and zest. Fold whipped cream mixture into yolk mixture. Pour into a 9-10-inch spring-form pan. Cover. Freeze at least 5 hours.

Preheat broil element. In large bowl, beat egg whites with sugar until stiff peaks form. Remove cake from freezer and spread egg white mixture over the top of the lemon mousse. Place on top rack of oven. Broil for 1 minute. Watch very closely since it burns quite fast. Cover. Return to freezer. Serve frozen. Serves 6-8. Prep time: 15 minutes.

TILAPIA

This is a simple and delicious recipe. It can be doubled or tripled. Best eaten same day it is cooked.

2 tilapia fillets cut in half
2 pieces lox
1 leek
white cooking wine
1 tbsp. dill
1 tbsp. chopped garlic cloves
1 tbsp. oil butter or margarine

Wash leak well, cutting lengthwise. Chop only the white section. Fry cut up garlic in little oil while making sure it does not burn. Now fry the leek with the garlic. Take baking dish and put leeks and garlic on bottom.

Cut tilapia fillets in half lengthwise. Butter the side of the fish that will remain on the outside when baking (for dairy dish). For pareve, use margarine.

Place one slice of lox over tilapia and roll up securing with a toothpick. Once all the tilapia has been rolled, place over leeks.

Sprinkle some drops of white cooking wine on top of fish and garnish with chopped dill. Other cooking spices may also be used. Bake at 350 for 30-40 minutes.

SPICY CARROT AND ROASTED CAULIFLOWER SOUP

Please note that some of the spices included in this recipe are kitniyot and therefore acceptable for Sephardim only at Passover. You can use whatever spices you wish to give this soup its own unique taste.

2 onions, chopped
4 cloves of garlic, chopped
3 tbsp. olive oil
8 cups of vegetable or chicken broth
3 bags of baby carrots
1 cauliflower, separated into small florets
1 tsp. fresh ginger chopped
1/2-1 tsp. salt (or to taste)
1 tsp. sugar (or to taste)
freshly ground pepper
1-2 tsp. garam masala
1/4-1/2 tsp. cinnamon
1 1/2 tbsp. curry
1/2 tbsp. hot curry
1 tsp. cumin
cayenne pepper (if you want it extra hot)

Preheat oven to 400. In bowl toss cauliflower florets with 2 tbsp. of olive oil and garam masala. Spread on greased cookie sheet and roast cauliflower for 1/2 hour or until soft.

Add 1 tbsp. oil to large pot, sauté onion, garlic and ginger till softened.

Add broth and carrots. Bring to boil. Simmer until the carrots are soft.

Add half the roasted cauliflower. Using immersion blender, blend the soup until smooth. Add seasoning and adjust flavours. Add remaining roasted florets.

Note: This recipe can be made with sweet potatoes instead of carrots.

CHAROSET

This makes a very sticky charoset. We shape it into a pyramid and decorate it with rows of almonds. One year we got fancy and a friend helped us make a sphinx!

2 small apples
1 orange
8 oz. pitted dates
3 oz. dried apricots
1 cup walnut pieces
2 tsp. cinnamon
whole almonds to decorate the outside of the pyramid

Peel and quarter the apples. Peel and separate orange into pieces. Combine all ingredients in food processor and process until you have a thick mixture. Shape and decorate!

Desserts so good you won't even miss the flour

Daphna Rabinovitch
Special to The CJN

There are so many interesting food blogs out there, one could spend all day perusing them, reading about people's lives and what they do for pleasure, what their families are like and, of course, what they eat.

What does all this have to do with Passover? Well, I was reading a particular blog the other day titled Jew In The City, written by a young Jewish woman who has left her Conservative upbringing behind for a more Orthodox lifestyle. She writes that sometimes she misses the food that she grew up with.

It got me thinking. Surely, just because beef or chicken is on the seder menu, does that mean I must forego a luscious creamy dessert? With the availability of high quality non-dairy whip topping and ice cream makers, the sky is the limit, regardless of the main course. You'll never miss the cream in the caramel sauce that accompanies the chocolate soufflé cake, and the lemon and white chocolate mousse parfaits are both sweet and puckeringly tart at the same time. The pear sorbet is so creamy and luxe, you'll swear there was a fillip of cream in it too.

CHOCOLATE PECAN SOUFFLÉ CAKE WITH CARAMEL PECAN SAUCE

Because non-dairy liquid topping is used for the caramel sauce, it will be a bit runnier than conventional caramel sauce.

1 lb. bittersweet chocolate, chopped
1 cup margarine or butter
8 eggs, separated
1 cup granulated sugar
1 tsp. vanilla
1/4 tsp. salt
1/4 cup finely chopped pecans
Sauce:
1 cup granulated sugar
1 cup pecan halves
2/3 cup non-dairy liquid whip topping

Preheat oven to 350. Lightly grease bottom and sides of 10-in. springform pan. Line bottom with round of parchment paper. Set aside.

Melt chocolate and margarine in stainless steel bowl set over pot of barely simmering water, stirring occasionally. Let cool for 5 minutes.

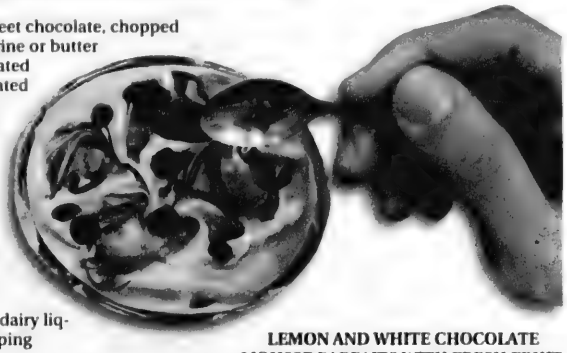
In bowl of electric mixer, beat egg yolks with 1/2 cup of the sugar until very pale and thick. Set aside.

In separate clean bowl, whip egg whites with salt until soft peaks are formed. Gradually beat in sugar until stiff but not dry peaks are formed.

Fold one-third of egg yolk mixture into chocolate. Fold in remaining egg yolks in two additions along with vanilla. Fold one-quarter of egg whites into chocolate mixture. In two more additions, fold in remaining egg whites. Fold in pecans.

Transfer mixture to prepared pan. Bake in centre of preheated oven for 30 to 35 minutes or until cake tester comes out with very moist crumbs still clinging to it. Cool in pan on rack. Remove springform and refrigerate for at least 4 hours or for up to 24 hours.

Sauce: Combine sugar and 1/4 cup water in heavy bottomed saucepan. Cook over medium heat, stirring occasionally, until sugar is dissolved. Increase heat to medium-high and cook, without stirring, for about 5 minutes or until mixture turns a deep amber colour. Immediately stir in pecans. Stir in whip topping until mixture has stopped bubbling and pecans are well coated. Cook for 5 minutes. Transfer to serving bowl and let cool. Slice cake and serve with caramel sauce. Makes 12 to 16 servings.



LEMON AND WHITE CHOCOLATE MOUSSE PARFAITS WITH FRESH FRUIT

A little of this goes a long way due to its richness.

1/2 cup granulated sugar
1/2 cup freshly squeezed lemon juice
2 tbsp. finely grated lemon zest
5 egg yolks
5 oz. high quality white chocolate, chopped
2-1/3 cups non-dairy liquid whip topping
6 cups fresh fruit, blueberries, raspberries and sliced fresh strawberries

In stainless steel bowl, whisk together sugar, lemon juice and zest and egg yolks. Place over saucepan of simmering water. Cook, whisking often, until thickened, 5 to 10 minutes. Set aside to cool slightly.

In separate stainless steel bowl, combine white chocolate and 2 tbsp. of whip topping. Place over saucepan of simmering water. Cook, stirring often, until chocolate is melted and smooth. Cool slightly.

Beat remaining whip topping until firm peaks form. Fold half into lemon mixture and half into white chocolate mixture.

Spoon 1/4 cup of lemon mousse into bottom of 12 parfait glasses. Top with single layer of fruit. Spoon 1/4 cup of white chocolate mousse over fruit. Top white chocolate mousse with fruit. Top with 1/4 cup more lemon mousse and more fruit. Cover parfait glasses with plastic wrap and refrigerate for at least 2 hours or for up to 24 hours. Serve with additional fresh fruit. Makes 12 servings.

Israel increases Golan-area forces

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel's military has increased its forces on the northern border with Syria following advances by Syrian rebels in the Golan Heights region.

The rebels reportedly began entering the demilitarized zone between Syria and Israel on Saturday and threatened to retake the Golan. Most of Syrian President Hafez Assad's troops have left the area, Ynet reported.

Ynet said that the Israeli troops sent to the Golan are intended to back up the elite forces and operational artillery units patrolling the area.

Rebels shot firearms near the Israeli border in the demilitarized zone.

"We are now in front of the occupied Golan, the blessed land sold by Hafez Assad," a rebel says in a video clip posted online Saturday night, according to Ynet.

"For 40 years, not a single gunshot has been fired on this land. For 40 years, not a single gunshot has been fired towards Israel," the rebel said. "We will free the Golan and it will return to the free Syrian people, with the help of Allah."

Also Saturday, the rebels released into Jordan 21 Filipino United Nations peacekeeping troops whom they had held for four days. The day before the release, several peacekeeping troops left their posts on the border and crossed into Israel.

But even with Chavez gone, felled by an undisclosed cancer at age 58 just weeks into his fourth term, Venezuelan Jews aren't quite ready to exhale.

For one thing, Chavez leaves behind a country racked by violent crime and mired in economic turmoil. For another, Chavez played such a commanding role in Venezuelan life and politics that nobody is quite sure what will happen to the country.

Perhaps most notably for Venezuela's Jews, far fewer of them are still around to find out.

Over the past 14 years, Jews have been leaving the country in droves. When Chavez was elected in 1999, more than 20,000 Jews lived in Venezuela. Today, the community is estimated to have fallen to less than half that number. During the more challenging years of Chavez rule, Jewish organizations even developed a plan in concert with local Jews for the evacuation of the country's Jewish community should the need arise. The plan is still on the shelf.

Jews were not the only ones to take flight from the Chavez regime. Hundreds of thousands of upper- and middle-class Venezuelans left during the Chavez years, seeking to escape Venezuela's anti-business climate, the government's nationalization of private companies, economic crises and a soaring crime rate. Jews left for many of the same reasons, with antisemitism by all accounts taking a back seat to concerns for economic and physical security.

With Chavez gone, an opportunity for change has come. But it's far from clear that the situation will improve for the Jews of Venezuela, at least in the short term.

Venezuela's constitution appears to require that new elections be held within 30 days. In his final months, Chavez made clear his preference that his vice-president, Nicolas Maduro, take over Chavez's so-called Bolivarian revolution. The likeliest opponent to Maduro, who has echoed Chavez's anti-western rhetoric, is Henrique Capriles Radonski, who lost to Chavez by an 11-point margin in elections held last October.

Capriles, who identifies as a Catholic, also happens to be the grandson of Holocaust survivors – a fact Chavez exploited in launching antisemitic attacks against him.

During the 2012 presidential campaign, state-run media urged Venezuelans to reject "international Zionism" and vote against Capriles, describing him as having "a platform opposed to our national and independent interests." Chavez also said the Mossad, Israel's secret service, was out to kill him and accused Israel of financing Venezuela's opposition. Government media described Capriles as "Jewish-Zionist bourgeoisie."

The Anti-Defamation League and the Simon Wiesenthal Center condemned Chavez for his rhetoric.

The campaign was typical Chavez, only the latest in a long series of episodes that left Jews feeling deeply unsettled in a country that before Chavez had remarkably little antisemitism.

> Chavez nurtured an ever-closer relationship with Iran

The first signs of trouble under Chavez came during the years of the second intifadah, when the government sponsored rallies in support of the Palestinian cause. After one such rally in May 2004, the Sephardic Tiferet Israel Synagogue in Caracas was attacked.

But it wasn't until November of that year that Venezuelan Jews felt directly targeted by the government, when security forces carried out an armed raid on a Jewish school in Caracas, Hebraica, after the police reportedly received an anonymous call. The incident was described in a report by Tel Aviv University's Stephen Roth Institute for the Study of Contemporary Antisemitism and Racism as "perhaps the most serious incident ever to have taken place in the history of the Jewish community" in Venezuela.

Chavez kept up his anti-Israel and anti-western rhetoric throughout the 2000s, calling then-U.S. president George W. Bush a devil during a 2006 speech at the United Nations and linking Israeli and American "terrorist" policies. During the 2006 Lebanon War, Chavez accused Israel of perpetrating a "new Holocaust" and using Nazi-like methods to kill Lebanese and Palestinians.

Meanwhile, Chavez nurtured an ever-closer relationship with Iran. The seemingly incongruous friendship between Chavez, a secular socialist, and Ahmadinejad, president of an Islamic theocracy, was built around shared hostility to the United States, the West and Israel. The two leaders sharply increased bilateral trade, inaugurated weekly flights between Caracas and Tehran, and frequently visited each other. As the size of the Iranian diplomatic presence in Venezuela grew, western security experts accused Venezuela of providing Iran with a Latin American base for illicit activities, including arms trading.

Venezuela's final break with Israel came in 2009, during the three-week Israel-Hamas war in Gaza that began in late December 2008. Chavez severed diplomatic ties with the Jewish state, expelling the Israeli ambassador in Caracas and accusing Israel of committing genocide against the Palestinians. Chavez also insisted that the Jews of Venezuela rebuke Israel for its actions.

Chavez's constant linkage of Venezuelan Jewry with Israel seemed to give presidential sanction to antisemitism, even if Chavez himself said he "respected and loved" Jews.

Antisemitic graffiti appeared in Caracas, equating the Jewish Star of David with the swastika. Broadcasters on state radio recommended the antisemitic forgery The Protocols of the Elders of Zion as an insightful read. Jewish institutions and houses of worship in Venezuela were attacked.

"People are being taught to hate," then-Venezuelan chief rabbi Pynchas Brener told JTA in early 2009. "Venezuela has never seen anything like this before."

Coalition will likely have 70 members

Turning to the incoming members of his presumptive cabinet, Netanyahu added, "I expect the ministers of the next government to take a cue from your dedication… Your work can serve as an example for the next government."

After a night-long meeting that ended Sunday morning, representatives of Likud-Beiteinu, Yesh Atid and Jewish Home indicated that they hope to be able to form a new government as early as March 12. The sides reportedly came together on issues surrounding the assignment of ministerial portfolios (although some differences still remain), the particulars of a universal draft bill, and an understanding about the baseline policies of the new governing coalition.

Benjamin Netanyahu

One of the final sticking points appeared to be a disagreement between the largely secular Yesh Atid and Jewish Home regarding an initiative to provide public transportation on Saturday. Another issue that was holding up a deal was the demand by Jewish Home's Naftali Bennett for the public diplomacy ministry in addition to the position of industry, trade and labour minister.

Shas party leader Eli Yishai wrote on Facebook Saturday night that a coalition agreement without his haredi party was a fait accompli, and that his party's exclusion from the government was a bitter moment for the State of Israel.

The coalition will likely comprise Netanyahu's Likud-Beiteinu (31 seats), Yesh Atid (19), Jewish Home (12), Hatnua (6) and Kadima (2), for a total of 70. Labor would lead the opposition, in which the two haredi parties, Shas and United Torah Judaism, would also sit, sources said.

The sources added that Yesh Atid's Yair Lapid, who had hoped to become foreign minister, will serve as finance minister. The Foreign Ministry post will be kept open for former foreign minister Avigdor Liberman, who resigned in December to fight corruption charges and hopes to return quickly to the post after clearing his name.

The defence minister will likely be former IDF chief of the general staff Moshe Ya'alon (Likud); Housing could well go to Jewish Home's Uri Ariel, while the same party's Eli Ben Dahan could take Religious Affairs; and Kadima leader Shaul Mofaz could become minister of welfare. Other ministerial positions have yet to be finalized.

The emerging compromise on haredi military service will see 1,500 to 2,000 scholars exempted from service each year — a far higher number than the 400 limit Yesh Atid had sought. In another reported compromise, haredi men will be called for service at age 22, not 18.

Some younger Likud Knesset members were reported to be upset with Netanyahu for apparently overlooking their ranks in the selection of cabinet ministers.

Officials walk out of IAEA talks

JTA

WASHINGTON — Canadian, U.S. and Australian officials walked out of a meeting of the UN nuclear watchdog agency when the Iranian envoy accused Israel of genocide.

The delegates all stormed out of a meeting at the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) in Vienna on March 6, after Ali Asghar Soltaneh, Iran's ambassador to the agency, made the accusation, Reuters reported.

Shawn Caza, Canada's counsellor and deputy permanent representative to the IAEA, stormed out of the meeting along with Joseph MacManus, the U.S. ambassador to the agency.

Rick Roth, a spokesperson for Foreign Affairs Canada, said Caza walked out "on principle."

"Canadian diplomats will not sit idly by while countries like Iran make hateful and antisemitic remarks. Our diplomats today showed Canada's principled foreign policy in action," Roth wrote in an email to The CJN.

MacManus had earlier accused Iran of "deception, defiance and delay" in its dealing with the agency.

The meeting came weeks ahead of a renewed effort at talks in Istanbul by major powers, led by the United States, to negotiate terms with Iran to make its nuclear program more transparent. Western powers and Israel believe Iran is close to being able to manufacture a nuclear weapon. Iran denies this, and Soltaneh repeated these denials calling the accusations "baseless."

A pact of pariahs between Hungary and Iran

Cnaan Liphshiz
JTA

BUDAPEST, Hungary — The potholed streets leading to Tiszavasvari's rusty train station offer no clue that this sleepy town of 12,000 in eastern Hungary is considered the "capital of Jobbik," the country's ultra-nationalist, anti-Jewish party whose name means "better."

The first sign appears near the office of the mayor, Erik Fulop, the first of five Jobbik politicians elected to run a Hungarian municipality. Shortly after taking office in 2010, Fulop set up a twinning arrangement between Tiszavasvari and the Iranian city of Ardabil, and a sign in Hungarian and Farsi near the office celebrates those ties.

Observers say the announcement of the twinning arrangement was the first international event held in Hungary under Jobbik's auspices and a mark of a growing partnership aimed at breaking through the isolation that both the party and the Iranian government are labouring under – Iran for its suspected nuclear-weapons program and support for terrorism, Jobbik for its hyper-nationalism and antisemitism.

Tiszavasvari's official website states that "the embargo on Iran is merely a way for world powers to monopolize trade with Iran," and expresses hope that the town "may lead the way to reversing this process." Jobbik's leader, Gabor Vona, has hosted a number of Iranian delegations there since the start of the twinning arrangement.

"The Persian people and their leaders are considered pariahs in the eyes of the West, which serves Israeli interests," said Marton Gyongyosi, Jobbik's foreign policy chief, at a pro-Iran demonstration organized by the party in December at the U.S. Embassy in Budapest. "This is why we have solidarity with the peaceful nation of Iran and turn to her with an open heart."

Jobbik's meteoric rise since its founding in 2003 has long been a source of consternation to Hungary's Jewish communal leaders, some of whom fear its growth is a driving factor behind Jewish emigration from the central European country. Currently, the third-largest faction in parliament, Jobbik increased its share of the popular vote nearly eightfold in the four years before 2010 and currently holds 47 of 386 parliamentary seats.

Less well-known is the party's intensifying partnership with Iran. Following Fulop's decision to twin with Ardabil, another Jobbik mayor, Juhasz Oszkar of Gyogyospata, also twinned with an Iranian municipality. Top Jobbik figures joined Hungarian businessmen on a trip to Iran to help deepen commercial ties between the countries. And Jobbik is one of only two parties represented in parliament's Hungarian-Iranian friendship committee.

> 'It is antisemitism that binds the Hungarian ultranationalists with the ayatollahs of Tehran in a nexus of hate'

"It is antisemitism that binds the Hungarian ultranationalists with the ayatollahs of Tehran in a nexus of hate," Abraham Foxman, the national director of the Anti-Defamation League, wrote in 2011. "That is all they have in common."

In truth, Jobbik's affinity toward Iran goes much deeper. The party is intensely opposed to globalization and the unification of Europe, lacks for international partners due to its radical rhetoric and sees in Iran not only one of the few governments willing to engage with it, but one with a shared commitment to resisting western hegemony.

Jobbik officials did not reply to repeated requests for an interview, but party sources did speak to investigative journalist Ferenc Szlazsanszky, who believes the party is determined to nurture relations with any country capable of helping Hungary end its "enslavement" by the European Union and the United States.

Insignia of the Jobbik Party

According to Szlazsanszky, a writer with the Hungarian weekly Hetek, the "driving force" behind Jobbik's pro-Iranian stance is Gyongyosi, the foreign policy chief, who drew a volley of international criticism in November when he called for the registration of Hungarian Jews, citing their potential as a security risk. He said later he was referring to Hungarian Israelis.

The son of a diplomat, Gyongyosi lived as a boy in several Muslim countries, and his ties in the East were a major factor in shaping the party's pro-Muslim stance, Szlazsanszky wrote in November.

"It is unacceptable that the once-flourishing trade between Iran and Hungary sank to almost zero. This is what Jobbik intends to change," Gyongyosi said in a recent interview in Barikad!, a Jobbik-affiliated weekly. "For Iran, Hungary is the West, and for Hungary, Iran is the gate to the East."

Jobbik's general antagonism toward Israel has blossomed in recent months into a fully-fledged campaign. Gyongyosi has announced a national tour of lectures on the "Zionist threat to world peace." In parallel, anti-Jewish or anti-Israel articles now take up more than 30 per cent of the content on the party's English-language website.

"It is no coincidence that Jobbik is intensifying its anti-Israel propaganda the more it tightens its ties with Iran," said Joel Rubinfeld, co-chairman of the Brussels-based European Jewish Parliament, who recently returned from a round of talks in Hungary. "The time correlation is one of the ways in which we see the Iranian fingerprint on Jobbik."

As with Iran's alliances with other rogue regimes, like Syria and Venezuela, the country's partnership with Jobbik may be one of simple convenience. Neither have many friends from which to choose.

Claims Conference ועידת התביעות
The Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany

Holocaust-Era Assets in Former East Germany

The Claims Conference has established a Late Applicants Fund ("LAF") of €50 million in order to accept applications from the following heirs of a former Jewish owner ("persecutee") of property/assets in the former East Germany for which the Claims Conference received proceeds as Successor Organization under the German Property Law of 1990:

(a) The immediate testamentary heir of the persecutee; (b) Children, grandchildren, or great grandchildren of the persecutee; (c) Siblings of the persecutee; (d) Children of siblings listed under (c); (e) Spouses of persons listed under (b), (c) and (d).

Applications can be filed directly with the Claims Conference for no fee. There is no need for applicants to pay a fee to any party. The LAF will accept applications through December 31, 2014.

After the application deadline, the Claims Conference shall determine the payment that each eligible heir will receive. This determination will be based on a number of factors detailed on the Claims Conference website.

The Claims Conference has published on its website, www.claimscon.org, a list of the properties/assets received by the Claims Conference as of the date of publication, and such assets for which claims by the Claims Conference are still pending under the German Property Restitution Law, including the name of the former owners and/or businesses, as well as the addresses of the properties/assets.

The detailed rules of the LAF, applications, and other information are also on the Claims Conference website, www.claimscon.org.

All communications regarding the Late Applicants Fund should be submitted to:
Claims Conference Successor Organization,
Sophienstrasse 26, D-60487 Frankfurt am Main, Germany.
Fax: ++49-69-97-07-08-11. Email: claims-conference-laf@claimscon.org

To aid applicants who do not have complete information, the Claims Conference has a Department for Property Identification. If you believe that you or your relatives may have owned Jewish property in the former East Germany, please include as much information as possible in your application and the Department will endeavor to identify such property. Please write to the above address. There is no charge for this service as well.

The Claims Conference has appointed an Ombudsman. To contact the Office of the Ombudsman, please email Ombudsman@claimscon.org or write to The Ombudsman, PO Box 585, Old Chelsea Station, New York, NY 10113, USA

Economist upbeat about Israel's economic status

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Prior to the global financial crisis that struck in 2008, Israel's economy was humming along nicely, posting enviable growth rates of six per cent per year.

When the crisis hit, "everybody suffered," including Israel. But unlike many other developed nations, it bounced back quickly. "Israel is showing a significant degree of resilience," said Tel Aviv University (TAU) economist Leo Leiderman.

Speaking to financial advisers and supporters of TAU at the downtown offices of Dundee Securities, Leiderman said Israel's GDP is expected to eclipse those of Canada and the United States in 2013. Israel's economy is expected to expand by 3.3 per cent, Canada's by 1.8 per cent and that of the United States by 2.1 per cent. Major European economies, like those in Spain and Italy, are expected to contract in 2013, Spain's by 1.6 per cent. Israel's potential is for even greater growth, but its economy is heavily correlated to the world economy and its prospects are hamstrung by the reliance on global conditions, Leiderman said.

Speaking on the outlook for Israel and global markets, Leiderman said one of the reasons Israel avoided some of the worst repercussions of the downturn was its diversified export market: 30 per cent of its goods and services go to the United States, 20 per cent to Asian countries, 29 per cent to the European Union and 21 per cent is sent elsewhere.

"The negative shock can be spread evenly – that has been a plus for us," he said.

What's more, Israel had already gone through some of the adjustments developed economies are currently experiencing. In the 1980s it, too, struggled with an oversized public debt – 200 per cent of GDP back then, only 75 per cent of GDP today.

"Things have flipped over. On important fundamentals in a macro [economic] perspective, to how government finances have been managed in a sound way, to the debt to GDP ratio, Israel's numbers are stable or declining," he said.

As a result, and despite the country's well-known security concerns, Israel is seen as a relatively safe venue for investment. "Country risk" can be demonstrated by the premium governments must offer for their "paper" – government bonds. Venezuela, for instance, must offer 6.74 per cent more than the 10-year U.S. treasury rate of 1.8 per cent. Israel, which has never defaulted on a loan, sells its bonds at 175 basis points (1.75 per cent) above the same treasury yield. And for the first time ever, "Israel issued paper for 30 years, 145 basis points above U.S. treasuries – a very low cost of funding," he said.

By international standards, Israel's public debt "remains sound," he added.

Turning to the Israeli stock market, Leiderman said it has been "quite correlated" to the global market, but has "decoupled" over geopolitical concerns, not over economic ones. In 2012, the Israeli market dipped when reports surfaced that the country was considering a unilateral attack on Iran's nuclear facilities. It bounced back afterwards.

Leiderman, who also serves as chief economic advisor for Bank Hapoalim, characterized market returns in 2013 as "not bad." In the year to date, investors earned 3.8 per cent from the Israeli market, better than that negative 1.2 per cent in Canada, but not as strong as the 5.2 per cent returned by the Dow Jones index.

Turning to the Israeli social scene, Leiderman noted that Israelis were part of a wider international protest movement, though protests there were entirely peaceful without any violence or even broken windows.

Demonstrations centred on the cost of living, particularly housing costs, which are "too high."

A four-room apartment (three bedrooms) can run more than $600,000 in Tel Aviv and $460,000 in Jerusalem, he said. It costs an average Israeli eight years of salary to purchase a new home. In Canada the equivalent figure is 3.7 years of salary.

Leo Leiderman

"Clearly there is a problem," he said. "The solution is to make more supply available," in part by streamlining the bureaucratic process that hamstrings the release of land and the start of construction.

On the employment front, Israel's labour participation ratio is comparable to that of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), 74.2 per cent for Israel versus 70.8 per cent for the OECD.

Two segments of the Israeli population are under-employed, however. Only 45 per cent of Orthodox men and 26.7 per cent of Arab women are employed. But there are changes afoot. Jerusalem's "Silicon Valley" is hiring more Orthodox men, largely part time and "with good results."

One of the country's advantages over other developed economies is its relatively young population, Leiderman said. Only 16.4 per cent are over 65, compared to the working age population of 15 to 64. In Canada and the United States, the number is closer to 20 per cent seniors, and by contrast, 47 per cent of the Swiss population is elderly and 30.9 per cent of Germany's.

At the low end of the scale, 12 per cent of China's population and 7.7 per cent of India's are considered elderly.

Israel should see substantial benefits from the exploitation of natural gas resources, which is "a very positive development."

In a few years, Israel should be self-sufficient in the resource, saving the country $2.5 billion in imports. "This should boost growth by some one per cent and bring the current account (exports less imports) back to surplus," he stated.

Turning to Israel's renowned high-tech sector, Leiderman pointed out that the country "is still a place good for looking for new ideas." He referred to Brainsway, as an example. It's a company that has developed a "helmet for the treatment of chronic depression," which may even be used to help smokers quit, he said.

Putting it all together, Leiderman suggested that "people in Israel are quite happy and satisfied with their lives."

An OECD study surveyed populations in a number of countries and found that Israelis rated their satisfaction index higher than seven on a scale of zero to 10. That was comparable to the response of Canadians.

Asked by The CJN to square that finding with the protests that hit Israel, Leiderman said the demonstrations were "a generational issue. The proportion of young people protesting is higher than their share of the general population."

"We can't avoid the reality that in countries, in recent years, the growth has not been equally distributed. For those working in high-tech industries and multinationals, their income has gone up by much more than those in the middle class and in the domestic services industry."

The solution, he continued, was to invest in education, particularly "in the periphery of Israel" – the far north and south – "to make sure the schools there and the teachers get more than the average support, so these children have equal opportunity."

Leiderman's speaking tour was sponsored by TAU, the country's largest research university. TAU leads Israel in patents among Israeli academic institutions and is 22nd in the world.

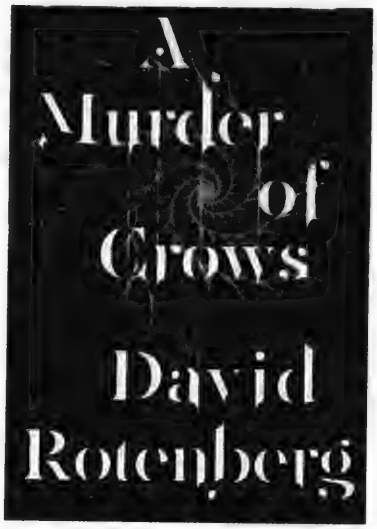
Thrilling action in second Junction Chronicles mystery

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

A Murder of Crows (Simon and Schuster) is Toronto mystery writer David Rotenberg's second book in the Junction Chronicles series.

Decker Roberts is a "synaesthete," someone who holds a unique mental power – in his case the ability to tell when people are speaking the truth.



Since readers last saw him in the previous book, Placebo Effect, Roberts has been keeping a low profile after his run-in with America's National Security Agency.

But the NSA, headed by Leonard Harrison, a "Tommy Lee Jones without the snark," and special agent Yslan Hicks, a young blond woman with almost translucent eyes, is keeping track of Roberts and other synaesthetes like him.

Roberts can tell whether people are speaking the truth by a series of squiggly lines that appear in his line of vision when someone is talking. In the past, he has used this gift for profit, consulting with big corporations for large fees.

But since the events of the previous book, he's been keeping a low profile and trying to find his estranged adult son, Seth, who has cancer.

Most of the book's action takes place in the United States, not in the Junction area of Toronto that gives the series its name, where Roberts is from.

The action in the first part of the book is fast and thrilling. Rotenberg deftly builds up the tension, letting the reader knows that something big is going to happen.

That something is a mass killing at a prestigious American college.

A disgruntled professor at Ancaster College, one of the best universities in America, plans on making a big splash on graduation day by detonating an explosive that will kill more than 200 students and faculty. He enlists the help of a school janitor, Walter Jones, who also seems to have deep issues.

The best parts of this book are those related to the janitor. In Richard Harris (Silence of the Lambs) style, Rotenberg gets us inside the mind of the psychopath. We find out about the people who've hurt him in the past and why he agrees to help the professor.

After the explosion, the NSA tracks Roberts down and forces him to use his skill to help them with the interrogation of witnesses.

At the college, Roberts discovers that NSA has been tracking other people like him and that the organization has also been using another synaesthe – a woman named Viola Tripping who can read the final thoughts of a person just before he or she dies – to help them solve this crime.

NSA agent Hicks takes the two of them to the crime scene so Tripping can read the victims' final thoughts and Decker can tell if they were lying or not.

This part of the novel was thrilling, and I could see how this subject can make an exciting TV series (there was some talk about this a few years ago), but then the story slows down drastically.

Although the NSA was using the synaesthetes to track down the killer or killers, there is never a sense of urgency, of racing against the clock. There is no reason to believe the killer or killers will strike again.

A lot of fuss is made made about the U.S. president travelling to Ancaster College to speak at the memorial service, but nothing really comes of it, and we are left with an unsatisfying Edgar Allen Poe-style climax involving a premature burial.

The subplot about Decker's friend, Eddie, a computer maven, who plans to incriminate a lawyer named Ira Charendoff, is complex, as is the account of events revolving around Decker's son, Seth, and there is a totally unnecessary bit in Africa.

Rotenberg plans to continue the series, so one imagines some of these plot lines will be picked up later.

Fans of the genre will find a lot to like in this book.

In Short:

• New from children/young adult author Carol Matas is Pieces of the Past: The Holocaust Diary of Rose Rabinowitz (Scholastic).

This is similar to the Winnipeg author's other books in Scholastic's "Dear Canada" series, which includes the award-winning Turned Away and Footsteps in the Snow.

Like them, Pieces of the Past is a fictional diary account of a young girl. Rose, as she begins her diary, is living in Winnipeg in 1948. She is encouraged by her new guardian, Saul, to write down an account of her time in wartime Poland and the Holocaust.

As she digs deeper into her past, she is haunted by the most terrifying memory of all. Will she find the courage to bear witness to her mother's ultimate sacrifice?

Intended for younger readers, the book also includes a short Holocaust history at the end, as well as photos and maps, to help children understand the period.

KOFFLER DIRECTOR LORI STARR TO HEAD JEWISH MUSEUM IN SAN FRANCISCO

Toronto's Koffler Centre of the Arts has begun a search for a new head after its current executive director, Lori Starr, announced she has accepted a position as executive director of the Contemporary Jewish Museum in San Francisco, beginning in June.

Starr had "a remarkable tenure of seven years" at the Koffler in which she transformed it into "a thriving, multidisciplinary cultural institution that now programs across the Greater Toronto Area to audiences of over 100,000 a year," the Koffler's board of directors said in a press release.

Starr had also served as vice-president for culture for the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and was an adviser to the International Jewish Presenters Network and the Harold Green Jewish Theatre.

"Lori Starr made an enormous contribution to Toronto while she led the Koffler," said Matthew Teitelbaum, director of the Art Gallery of Ontario. "She moved inventive and galvanizing programming into the community, while positioning important issues of our time into the public realm for active discussion. She did so with style, intelligence and true commitment. She made our community stronger. I know she will have an important and sustaining impact on San Francisco. The cliché is true. Our loss is San Francisco's gain."

Before coming to the Koffler, Starr served in a similar capacity at the Skirball Cultural Center in Los Angeles. She was also a Rockefeller Fellow in Museum Education and Community Arts at the Fine Arts Museums of San Francisco.

"I have learned so much from my work here," said Starr. "I am going to miss Toronto's vibrant arts scene and all the friends and colleagues I have gotten to know and admire."

An unusual past has influenced Polish-born painter

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Peter Barelkowski's oil paintings, spare in style and bold in colour, convey melancholic themes such as sadness, isolation and alienation.

Peter Barelkowski

In short, as he said in an interview last week, they portray what he described as a "landscape of human suffering."

Barelkowski, whose works are exhibited at Gallery 133 (1260 Castlefield Ave.) and found in private collections around the world, seems to be inspired by the dark undercurrents of life.

Born in Poznan, Poland, and a jeweller by trade, he turned to painting in the early 1970s and opened his first studio in 1975.

He left Poland in 1981 and immigrated to Britain. In 1982, he and his wife settled in Canada, where he studied at the Ontario College of Art from 1985 to 1988.

Although he earned a living as a jeweller, he always painted, drawing on his own experiences.

Now 60, Barelkowski has a most unusual pedigree. Brought up as a Catholic by his highly assimilated Jewish parents, he did not learn he was Jewish until he was 18.

The news was broken to him by his maternal grandmother.

"It was a shock," he recalled as he sat amid his paintings. "I didn't even ask my mother about it. My past suddenly fell apart and disappeared."

He learned that his grandfather, a prosperous food wholesaler who owned numerous properties, had gravitated toward Christianity and that his parents had masqueraded as Christians during the Nazi occupation of Poland.

In postwar Poznan, Barelkowski's parents chose not to "advertise their Jewishness," he observed.

"We were trying to survive."

Nor did they talk to him about the war period, when Jews in Poland were murdered on an industrial scale.

Barelkowski's emotions were also roiled by painful personal circumstances.

His parents' divorce saddened and angered him. His relationship with his alcoholic father was strained and distant.

And Barelkowski had to cope with his own demons: depression and alcoholism (which he managed to kick seven years ago).

Although he does not say so in as many words, these jolts and convulsions affected him as a person and as an artist.

He emigrated because he felt no real connection to Poland. "I just didn't feel at home," said Barelkowski, a sombre and serious man.

In retrospect, he is glad to have discovered his Jewish identity.

"I feel Jewish. I always had a longing for the Jewish People. I never really clicked with anyone else. Something was missing."

For the past few years, his paintings have been exhibited in a succession of galleries and venues, mainly in Toronto but also in New York City.

"I want to continue to do what what I love," Barelkowski said, cracking a slight smile.

Play connects black and Jewish communities

The Whipping Man is a universal tale of loyalty, deception and deliverance, co-presented by Harold Green Jewish Theatre and Obsidian Theatre Company.

Philip Akin

Directed by Obsidian's artistic director Philip Akin and starring Sterling Jarvis, Brett Donahue and Thomas Olajide, The Whipping Man opens at the Studio Theatre, Toronto Centre for the Arts, on March 16 and runs until April 14.

"It is a great team of actors," Akin says. "They are some of the hardest working and most open because I try to do some different things. The Studio is very intimate, and I think the play is going to be hugely powerful in that space. It will be fabulous."

The story takes place over Passover in 1865, just after America's Civil War. Jewish Confederate officer Caleb DeLeon comes home to Virginia only to find his house in ruins, his family missing and only two former slaves remain. The slaves, Simon and John, find themselves forced to take care of the badly wounded Caleb.

"It opens up this massive question about slavery and freedom," Akin says. He points out that at the time rabbis were divided over the slavery issue.

Poet, 92, inspired by Mideast conflict

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

David Zaretsky wants the world to hear his poems.

"If I don't get publicity, the world is going to be the loser for it," says the 92-year-old Toronto native who written 3,680 poems in 15 books of poetry compiled in binders. He published one of the books in 1999.

"I'm 92 years old. I've been divorced for 30 years. I have to do everything at home myself. I have to make my food and clean my apartment. If it wasn't for poetry, I'd probably be dead," he says.

He began writing poems in the form of lyrics for local musicians, but at his daughter's suggestion, he made the switch to poetry.

His work covers a plethora of topics, but one of his major inspirations is the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Although some of his opinions may be controversial, he's not afraid to share them with the world, performing this poetry at schools and other venues, such as Baycrest and the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living.

"[My poems] have to be evocative, metrical-versed, beautiful sounding, meaningful, controversial and very enjoyable to read, otherwise they don't go into my books," he says.

When he recites his work – which he's very keen to do – it sounds as if he's performing.

David Zaretsky

He says reciting his poetry is what helps him when he can't sleep at night, and it keeps him happy.

"I never get depressed," he says. "If I get depressed, I pick up a book and start reading any of my books and I get exhilarated."

Given that he spent only a year in high school and has never collaborated with anybody in his work, he says he's sure somebody "up there" is helping him.

"Nobody can recite like me, nobody can read like me and nobody can write like me," he says, "and I can prove it."

There's More to Life

There's more to life, than anyone imagines,
There's more to life, that no one can forsee,
You've got to be prepared, to face each challenge,
And for a fact, how scary that can be,

We can't afford, to take too much for granted,
Confusing though at times, it seems to be,
There's more to life, that calls for education,
We have to question, everything we see,

We learn a lot, from watching television,
We learn a lot, about our history,
And even though at times, feel disenchanted,
We have to learn to live, accordingly,

We're capable, sometimes of improvising,
How lucky, we may yet turn out to be,
It's tantamount, to getting satisfaction,
There's more to life, that's still a mystery.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Play a perfect fit for both companies

"In Leviticus, it says you can have bondsmen and bondsmaids. But the hook in this play is that these slaves were raised to be Jewish, and in my understanding, once you are a Jew, you are a Jew, no matter where you came from. And, if that's the case, how can you be a slave," he says. "So that's the main conundrum – the cost of freedom for both groups."

Akin believes that in any play the audience should be active participants and come away with questions. "The best thing about any play that I have ever directed is that people are discussing or disagreeing afterwards about it.

"It is not about that I want them to come away thinking thus or so, because everyone is going to bring who they are to the play, and who they are is going to resonate to the play in a particular way. And that's going to be what they take from this and I can't control that, and I don't want to control that."

Akin was born in Jamaica but is Canadian because his father and grandfather held Canadian citizenship. Akin says his family is one-third black, one-third Scottish and one-third Jewish on his mother's side.

"The motto of Jamaica is 'out of many, one people,' and that is true of me and that is true of most people in the islands. There is a huge blend of who we are. In my rougher moments I say, 'I'm black, I have a kilt and I've had a bris – what else do we need?'"

Akin is a founding member of Obsidian Theatre, Canada's leading black theatre company, and has served as its artistic director since 2006. He says teaming up with the Harold Green Jewish Theatre (HGJTC) involved a little serendipity when he happen to meet HGJTC board member Michael Rubinoff who told him about the play and mentioned he also told HGJTC about it. After reading the play, both companies saw it as a perfect fit.

Akin says all the productions of the play in America that he's aware of, have been co-productions between black and Jewish organizations. "I have always believed that when our two communities actually work together we achieved really great things and when we haven't there have been some issues," he says. "This is a wonderful play to build those connections back again."

Akin's other directing efforts include Ruined, Toronto the Good, El Paso, Intimate Apparel, Black Medea, Born Ready and Pusha Man. He's also acted in productions of Othello and Of Mice and Men at the Stratford Festival.

In 2011, Akin received the Mallory Gilbert Leadership Award; the Bra D'Or Award from the Playwright's Guild of Canada and was the Toronto Sun's Performance Artist of the Year. In 2010, he received the Silver Ticket Award for Outstanding Contribution to the Arts presented by the Toronto Alliance for the Performing Arts. In addition, he's the vice-president of the board for the Canadian Contemporary Dance Theatre.

Maccabi Canada to field cricket team at summer games

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

There are some sports in the Maccabiah pantheon that Canadians excel at – think hockey, softball, baseball, even judo and tennis.

But what about cricket? The confusing, can't make heads-or-tails contest in which a "square cut" at an "overpitched googly" can get you "stumped," just before the batsman is "dismissed"?

Yes, that game.

Well, "bumper"!

It turns out Canada does indeed have plans to field a cricket team at this summer's Maccabiah Games in Israel. The team consists largely of immigrants from India, South Africa and other hot climate countries, who brought their cricket skills with them.

Emmanuel Joseph is coaching the team, which will join Great Britain, Israel, South Africa and Australia in vying for a medal. A native of Mumbai, India, Joseph played on the Indian team at the 1985 and 1989 Maccabiah Games. He wants the younger generation of local cricketers to experience what he did – participation in the "Jewish Olympics."

"The Maccabiah Games has always been my dream," he said. "I know what it is to be Jewish and [compete] at the Maccabiah Games. I know what it means, and it's the dream of the boys as well. It's been my dream since 1993."

That was the year Joseph immigrated to Canada. Moving to a country where cricket is pretty much an exotic foreign sport didn't mean he had to give it up. Soon after his arrival, he played at the Toronto Cricket Club, where he attempted to put together a Jewish team that he hoped would compete in the 1993 Games.

Though that effort didn't pan out, he took the long view and kept the idea in the back of his mind.

About 2-1/2 years ago, Joseph brought together some of the local Jewish players into a team called the Pioneer Cricket Club.

"The guys got together and said, 'We've got a lot of Jewish players here, why don't we put together a team,'" Joseph recounted.

The name was chosen because, "I felt we were pioneers to do something big, to represent Canada for the first time at the Maccabiah Games," he explained.

The town of Stouffville provided them a "home field" on Bethesda Road, and during the winter months, the team practises indoors

The 13 guys on the team play in the Markham League in mostly friendly matches and they work out regularly.

When he approached Maccabi Canada president Tom Bacher with the suggestion that the organization should sanction a cricket team to the 2013 Games, he was given a green light – with the proviso that the group raise the $8,300 a player needed to send them to Israel.

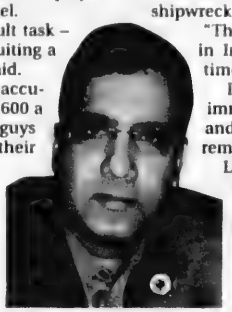
That has proven a difficult task – far more difficult than recruiting a competitive team, Joseph said.

Right now, the team has accumulated something like $3,600 a player, and that includes guys taking out loans and using their credit cards.

They've held a few fundraisers, but Joseph admits they're new to that endeavour and are learning about it on the fly.

"It's a concern right now, but the athletes are working hard right now," he said. "This is a dream come true for the athletes. This is going to be big for them personally, for Canada, and for the Bene Israel community."

The Bene Israel, or sons of Israel, is the name for the Jews of India. The people trace their origins to members of a tribe of Israel who washed up on the shore of the Kokan region in an ancient shipwreck.



Emmanuel Joseph

"The Bene Israel have been in India for a very, very long time," Joseph said.

In recent years, many have immigrated to North America and Israel, but 15,000 to 20,000 remain in India, he said.

Like others in the subcontinent, the Bene Israel took to cricket, and the local squad has plenty of skill to represent Canada ably, he said.

For more information, Joseph can be reached at Emmanuel.joseph@sympatico.ca.

Israeli windsurfer wins World Championship

JTA

NEW YORK — Israeli windsurfer Lee Korzits won the RS-X World Windsurfing Championships for the fourth time.

The gold medal last week in Buzios, Brazil, was the third consecutive world title for Korzits, who won her first gold medal in the 2003 World Mistral Championships.

Korzits failed to medal at last summer's London Olympics, finishing sixth after starting the final heat in second place.

In 2009, Korzits suffered a near-fatal surfing accident while working on the Professional Windsurfers Association's tour in Hawaii. Doctors told Korzits she would never surf again, but she rededicated herself to the sport.

Maccabi USA gets $1 million from former athlete

Gil Shefler
JTA

NEW YORK — Shoe designer Stuart Weitzman, a former member of the U.S. Maccabiah Games table tennis team, has donated $1 million to Maccabi USA.

The money will go to help fund the American team's participation in the Maccabiah Games in Israel in July as well as other commitments.

Weitzman, who founded Stuart Weitzman Shoes, a high-end footwear company, said his participation in the 2009 Games as a member of the U.S. team was "one of the greatest experiences" of his life.

"After experiencing the Games myself, I saw how Maccabi USA changes the lives of the athletes by enhancing their connection to their Jewish culture and heritage," Weitzman said in a statement.

The Maccabiah Games is an Olympics-style competition held every four years in Israel.

Temple Mount clashes

Israeli police entered Jerusalem's Temple Mount on March 8 to disperse hundreds of Palestinians throwing rocks and two Molotov cocktails at officers. Police spokesperson Mickey Rosenfeld said Palestinian worshippers rioted after Muslim prayers at the holy site in the Old City. Four people were arrested. Nine officers and 35 Palestinians were injured. Rosenfeld said police dispersed the crowd with stun grenades. In past weeks, tempers have been flaring throughout the West Bank, with many clashes between Palestinians and Israeli security forces and swirling talk of a "third intifadah." On March 6 police closed the Temple Mount Plaza after a group of Muslim women confronted Jewish women there. The Muslims blocked the Jews from visiting the site by surrounding them and shouting at them, according to reports. Police intervened and dispersed the women who returned a short time later with male Muslim worshippers who began to demonstrate against the police.

Plague of locusts

A swarm of one million locusts crossed into Israel from Egypt last week. The locusts remained concentrated in areas of southern Israel near the border, but sightings were reported throughout the country, including Tel Aviv and the Carmel region of northern Israel. Residents in the Negev area sealed their homes against the horde of invading pests. The Israeli Ministry of Agriculture sprayed the invaders with pesticides. The locust attack came three weeks before the start of Passover, which recalls a destructive plague of locusts that the Bible says was sent by God to free the Jewish slaves. Southerly winds last Friday, however blew a new swarm of locusts into Israel's Negev Desert, raising fresh concern of damage to crops over the weekend. A black cloud of more than 30 million locusts – some estimates ranged as high as 120 million – swarmed over parts of Egypt on March 2, causing millions of dollars worth of damage, according to Egyptian Agricultural Minister Salah Abad Almoman.

Peacekeepers flee to Israel

Eight Filipino United Nations observers abandoned their post on the Israel-Syria border March 8 and crossed into Israel to escape fighting between anti-regime rebels and the Syria army. The peacekeepers belonged to the same unit from which 21 troops were abducted by rebel forces two days earlier near the village of Jamla. The eight observers crossed the border near an Israeli army position and had first co-ordinated their arrival with the IDF. Israeli troops and UN personnel greeted them. The Filipino peacekeepers will be transferred to a UN base inside Israel. The Philippine government said March 8 that Syrian rebels had failed to release the 21 abducted peacekeepers. UN forces have patrolled a ceasefire line between Israel and Syria for nearly four decades.

Obama's visit not delayed

U.S. and Israeli officials said U.S. President Barack Obama would not delay his trip to Israel in the event that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is unable to form a government. A senior administration said the president hopes to address young Israelis on his upcoming visit to Israel. "The president's speech is an opportunity for him to speak directly with the Israeli people, in particular to young people, about the broad nature of the U.S.-Israeli relationship," the official told JTA. The official would not confirm reports in Israeli media that Obama's team had opted against a Knesset address and instead is seeking to organize an address to university students at Jerusalem's convention centre.

Train 'nut' builds life-sized VIA Rail coach

Jason Shron and his train (Cara Stern photos)

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Jason Shron's passion for trains is infectious. Sitting next to him on VIA Rail seats, listening to the recorded sounds of the train chugging along on the tracks, it's almost too easy to forget that the coach we've boarded isn't actually moving; it's in his basement.

After more than four years of work, the 38-year-old self-described train-obsessed nutcase has a slice of a train from around 1980 in his basement, built using parts he's acquired over the years from actual VIA Rail trains.

"If I'm obsessed with something, I want to surround myself with it," he said. Even that seems like an understatement coming from this father of three, who spends his days in his favourite seat – a second-row aisle seat – working as Canada's largest manufacturer of model trains.

Shron has been in love with trains his whole life – his earliest memory is being on board at two years old, which was his age when his family was moving to Toronto from Montreal. Throughout his life, he would take the train between the cities, visiting relatives. By the time he was four, he was irrevocably obsessed with trains.

He was just 12 when he became set on building the life-size installation in his home, and even wrote to VIA Rail to ask what it would take to acquire original seats (and VIA Rail responded apologizing that they could not sell any to him). He struck it lucky when, in 1998, he got his first seats from the junk pile at VIA's maintenance centre, and later he purchased more.

The hardest part was finding the pieces that aren't typically sold off, such as the garbage bin. In order to get these parts, Shron decided to buy an actual coach. Surprisingly, he said it didn't cost him very much. Once he removed the parts he didn't need, such as the tires, he made double what he paid for it. Apart from the actual coach, the whole project cost him around $10,000.

People who aren't train enthusiasts might wonder why he's so in love with trains that he's willing to devote his career and his basement to them.

"It's a snapshot of Canada," he said. "You take the train across Canada and sit on the coach, and people get on in the middle of nowhere and they have such different lives than a Thornhill Jew. You're sharing that life together for the few hours you're on the train."

But he didn't always know he'd spend his life designing model trains. He devoted years to studying art history, and was working toward a PhD in that subject in England when he decided he was unhappy with his career path.

"Because of the way academia works... if there's no money to expand the department, you have to wait for someone to retire," he said. "But I remember thinking, if I've got the ability to do something really well, I want to succeed or fail based on my ability or hard work."

He decided to take his chances forming his own business, and in this case, the gamble paid off, but it was due to a lot of hard work, he said. With a team, he designs the model trains, and then has two factories in China make the products.

It's not a cheap hobby – a train car would cost around $80, a locomotive would be around $350 and a complete train might be $1,500, he said, adding that those are retail prices, so as the manufacturer, he doesn't see all of that money.

However, sales passed the $1-million mark a few years ago, and although his American sales dropped during the recession, his Canadian sales remained steady.

Although his wife, published author Sidura Ludwig, is very supportive of his passion and appreciates that he loves trains, she isn't a train nut herself, which Shron said is a good thing.

"If she was obsessed with trains, we'd be off the rails," he joked. "She balances my absurdity and my nuttiness."

Now that he's conquered the train in his basement, he's continuing work on another lifelong dream – to recreate the journeys of youth. This huge project will feature a model of Toronto's Union Station with a route that goes as far as Brockville, Ont. That's as much of the route to Montreal that he can fit in what's left of his basement.

For the next 30 years, he'll be chugging away on that project. It's not moveable, so he intends to live in that Thornhill, Ont., house for the rest of his life.

"I'll move out of here when I'm drooling in a bib, and I won't care they're tearing apart my trains," he said.

For now, he'll sit in his favourite seat and ponder the stories these chairs hold about the people they carried throughout their 40-year history in service.

4 cups of organic grape juice

Two of my daughters spent a year in Israel studying at Midreshet Habanot – Ein Hanetziv. Little did I know until recently that this kibbutz in the heart of Emek Beit She'an is a neighbour to another kibbutz that has a focus on organic food, Sde Eliyahu.

Sde Eliyahu is a religious kibbutz that is accepting of all people and is one of the few kibbutzim that have not been privatized. For those of us who have memories of working on a kibbutz when we were younger and the kibbutz movement in Israel was strong, it is heartening to know that there is a kibbutz where members still meet three times a day in the communal dining hall, serve themselves and take their used dishes and utensils back to the wash-up stand.

Sustainable Jew

Fred Winegust

Forty-five years ago, the first steps toward ecological and environmentally friendly living appeared on Sde Eliyahu. It began when kibbutz members agreed that the use of insecticides, pesticides and chemical fertilizers in the fields was damaging to the Earth, the environment, the kibbutz members and the food they were growing. The kibbutz began to grow organic grapes, pomegranates, dates and vegetables.

Sde Eliyahu proved that crops could be successfully and profitably grown without chemical fertilizers and pesticides, in perfect harmony with nature and the environment. Today, the kibbutz is surrounded by a 500-metre-wide belt of naturally grown product where no chemicals have been used for years. "We live and breathe here – why on earth would we use poisons in our own backyards?" said kibbutznik Mario Levy, the father of organic agriculture in Israel. "We want to produce the best for the markets and ourselves, so we do it right – organically."

One of the rabbinical comments on Cor.ca/ask.html highlights the fact that both "wine and grape juice have always been an extremely important part of Jewish ritual. For that reason, all wine and grape juice must be made by people of Jewish faith and carry reliable kosher supervision."

Rabbi Daniel Korobkin, of the Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto, said that pesticides or other chemical additives in wine and grape juice are not halachic issues that require rabbinic authority or knowledge, but rather a health issue. It is important that the grape juice and wine production is properly supervised, so that the end product is kosher for Passover, and therefore useable at the seder.

The production of Sde Eliyahu's kosher organic grape juice is supervised by Rabbi Achiya Amitai, the rabbi of the kibbutz, and carries a Badatz certification. All of the grapes used in the production are untouched by chemicals and are handpicked before they enter the grape-juice making phase.

"This grape-juice product is being imported to North America from Israel for the first time in three years," says Nachum Grafstein, owner of Grafstein Wines in Toronto. "I have customers who don't drink wine, but are still looking for a quality, healthy product over which they can make kiddush. This kosher organic grape juice from Sde Eliyahu can fit the bill, not only for Passover, but all year round."

Wishing all my readers a sustainable Chag Kasher v'Samayach.

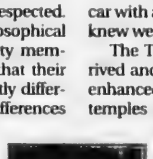
A Commie at our Shabbat table

There was a time in the Toronto Jewish community, about half a century ago and before, when diversity of opinion was respected.

Journals from across the philosophical spectrum were read by community members who were OK with the idea that their neighbours' opinions were stridently different than their own. Ideological differences were debated over a schnapps and herring. Individuals with conservative views looked forward to joining a Commie friend at a Shabbat table, arguing the existence of God, the significance of a Jewish state, the civil rights movement and the interpretation of the biblical "Esau hates Jacob" story. We seemed to have been more at home with our communal and personal belief systems, so much so that we allowed others their points of view. Change was celebrated. Differences were cause for dancing.



Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

Then free love dried up. The generation that survived the war and antisemitism in downtown Toronto started making it. They sold their panelled wagons and trotted over to the Cadillac dealership to buy an elegant car with a front end so long that the "goyim" knew we were no longer working for them.

The Toronto Jewish community had arrived and those who could afford it built or enhanced their own shuls, synagogues and temples with theatre seats and reserved parking spots for the sexton. Religious and lay leaders who were once independent in their interpretation of Jewish laws and the community voice found themselves seatbelted into the plush passenger side of their ba'alei batim's Eldorados, beholden to the families who built the edifices in which they operated.

The free flow of ideas began disappearing, and our bold leaders, universal in their thinking, moved south or to Israel. Denominational and ideological fiefdoms sprang up, and the push and pull of religious and institutional variety became a thing of the past.

The Jewish federation, a most essential central organization, followed suit, and while its message was one of unity through diversity, fundraising became its central motif, and it ultimately became what seemed like a new denomination within our community structure. Soon enough, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), an organizational role model in its advocacy and practice, was disbanded. The CJC was replaced by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, an entity more reflective of the old days when our community had no choice but to be insular with one voice.

For the past few years, we've operated as if our membership was one-dimensional in nature. Everyone took their corners, and we shut out much of the world, once again.

More recently, however, cracks began to show, and like a lyric in a Leonard Cohen song, the light shone through them. Jewish groups unaffiliated with the very safe organizations we have grown to question are cropping up and challenging the status quo. Advocacy groups within and outside shuls are fighting on behalf of the Roma community, and others are challenging the government while still supporting the State of Israel. Some rabbis are once again debating in public.

One such example was a recent intellectual battle, in this newspaper, over aspects of Torah between CJN columnist Rabbi Martin Lockshin and Rabbi Daniel Korobkin of Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto ("A book for the thoughtful, 'skeptical' Orthodox," Jan. 10; "When Orthodox scholarship is neither," Jan. 31, and on cjnews.com). How refreshing.

While the cracks may be small, it's just a question of time before the Toronto Jewish community morphs back, and moves forward, to a place with more eclectic leadership and a membership that embraces diversity of thought about our peoplehood, Israel, Torah and our place in the world.

Israel has a new government

Last Saturday night, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, left, informed President Shimon Peres that he had succeeded in forming a coalition. The new government, comprising 68 of the 120 members of Knesset, was sworn in Monday. Please see related story on page 35.

Pope Francis has Jewish connections

JTA

Jorge Mario Bergoglio, the Argentine cardinal who was elected pope and took the name Francis, is said to have a good relationship with Argentine Jews.

Pope Francis, 76, a Jesuit, was the choice of the College of Cardinals on March 13 following two days of voting in Vatican City. He is the first pope to come from outside Europe in more than a millennium. Reflecting the changing demographics of Catholics, he comes from Latin America.

As archbishop of Buenos Aires, Pope Francis attended Rosh Hashanah services at the Benei Tikva Slijot synagogue in September 2007.

Canadian Jewish organizations were quick to congratulate the new Pope last week. In a statement, David Koschitzky, chair of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, said he hoped Pope Francis would "continue the work of his predecessors and in so doing... break new ground in bringing together all of those who are made in the image of the Creator.

"We note the close relationship that His Holiness has had with the Jewish community of Argentina, and his many visits to synagogues where, in one moment, he said he came 'like a pilgrim, together with you, my elder brothers.'"

Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies, congratulated the Pope and noted his friendship with Argentine Jews.

"It is our understanding that Cardinal Bergoglio was a true friend to the Jewish community of Argentina in the aftermath of the horrific terrorist bombing by Iranian proxies in 1994," Benlolo said in a statement.

Zundel Lawyer Dies

VICTORIA — Doug Christie, the lawyer who defended every major Holocaust denier, neo-Nazi and accused war criminal in Canada over the past 30 years died March 11 of liver cancer at age 66. Among his clients were ex-teachers Jim Keegstra and Malcolm Ross, Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel, white supremacists John Ross Taylor and Wolfgang Droege, disgraced native leader David Ahenakew, and accused war criminals Imre Finta and Michael Seifert. Christie was first diagnosed in 2011 with prostate cancer.

WORLD

Jews Remembered

ATHENS — The Jewish community of Thessaloniki in northern Greece held a series of events March 16 and 17 to mark the 70th anniversary of the first deportations of the city's Jews to Auschwitz. On March 15, 1943, the Nazis sent the first convoy of 4,000 Jews to the death camp. By August, 49,000 out of a prewar population of 55,000 Jews had been deported. Fewer than 2,000 survived. Last week's events included a march from the city's Liberty Square to the Old Railway Station for a memorial and a ceremony March 17 at the city's Monastiriotes Synagogue, where Greek Prime Minister Antonis Samaras was expected to speak. Thessaloniki was a key centre of Sephardi Jewry for 450 years after the expulsion from Spain. Today, about 1,000 Jews live there.

Thugs Threaten Teen

PARIS — Three men who accosted a French Jewish teenager in a suburban Paris subway said they would do to him "what Mohammed Merah did." According to a report on the incident by the National Bureau of Vigilance against Anti-Semitism, an advocacy organization known by the French acronym BNVCA, the 17-year-old kippah-clad male was threatened in the southern Paris suburb of Vitry-Sur-Seine on March 3 by three black men who asked him "why Israel was doing this to the Palestinians." The report said the men also told the teen, that Merah, the 23-year-old Islamist who last year killed four Jews at a school in Toulouse, "was right to do what he did." They added, "Now we're going to do what Merah did. We will kill all of you Jews, one day we will kill a Jew." A witness corroborated the exchange, the watchdog group said. The presence of the witness may have prevented a physical attack on the teen, the organization added in its report on the incident.

Cdns. Fourth At Israeli Physics Meet

TEL AVIV — A team from Montreal's Hebrew Academy finished fourth in an international physics competition in Israel, the highest placing of any non-Israeli school.

The five-boy team was among 40 senior high school teams took part in the 18th annual Shalheveth Freier Physics Tournament at Israel's Weizmann Institute of Science, held March 12-13.

All but one of the other top 10 teams were from Israeli schools. A team from Slovenia finished sixth.

The teams must design and build a safe from a simple box based on physics principles, with a locking mechanism that opponents can't crack. They must also devise a physics riddle to further confound their peers.

Hebrew Academy's entry proved to be only one of four safes that were impenetrable. Moreover, Hebrew Academy's "The Walking Dead"-themed safe was also voted the favourite safe by the other students. The judges, Weizmann scientists, also took into account the teams' ingenuity and originality.

The Hebrew Academy boys' team beat Bialik High School, St. George's High School, The Study and a Hebrew Academy girls' team to win the eastern Canadian finals held in Montreal in February.

There was one other Canadian team at the competition, from the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Vaughan campus, which finished outside the top 10. Globally, 120 teams vied for a spot at the final in Israel, and only seven made it.

Parties quiet on change in Sobeys hechsher

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to the CJN

Amid reports the Montreal Vaad Ha'ir has been in talks to put its MK hechsher on the kosher bakery, meat and deli sections of Sobeys' store in Thornhill, Ont., none of the parties said to be involved would comment on the possibility of the MK expanding its presence in the Toronto area.

At a Feb. 20 press briefing in Montreal, the Vaad Ha'ir's executive director, Rabbi Saul Emanuel, spoke about the MK's proprietary kosher database and said his agency has been approached by companies across the country to supervise their products. Rabbi Emanuel would not confirm for The CJN whether Sobeys in Thornhill is one of these companies

A national spokesperson for Sobeys told The CJN that "Sobeys does not release or provide comment on any information regarding its current or pending business partnerships."

The Kashruth Council of Canada, which currently supervises Sobeys' Thornhill kosher flagship store under its COR hechsher, also had no comment on the possible incursion.

If the Montreal agency were to win the contract, Sobeys would be the first store or restaurant in the Toronto area to be supervised under the MK.

The MK hechsher already has a beachhead in the GTA. Since 2009, the MK has been found on airline meals originating from a kosher kitchen at Pearson International Airport. The facility was originally owned by Cara Operations Ltd., which sold its airline catering division's Canadian operations to Gate Gourmet in 2010.

Rabbi Avrom Pollak

The Kashruth Council also has a local competitor in Badatz Toronto, which supervises a number of food manufacturers and one synagogue caterer.

Montreal's Vaad Ha'ir is, apparently, not alone in its goal of expansion, as kashrut organizations race to gain worldwide market share among industrial food manufacturers. But when it comes to local caterers, restaurants and individual supermarkets, most consider them off-limits to outside agencies.

"We feel very strongly that that's best served by local [kashrut] organizations," said Rabbi Avrom Pollak, president of Baltimore-based Star-K Kosher Certification. "They are much more attuned to what is going on... than somebody trying to do it from a distance."

Kashruth Council spokesperson Richard Rabkin agreed.

"A community is best served by its local kosher certifier," he said, adding that his agency has been approached by retail establishments in other communities, but has thus far declined.

Competing standards would lead establishments to pick and choose "which rules suit them the best," Rabbi Pollak said, thereby confusing consumers: "Can I eat there? Can't I eat there?"

A fastidious chronicle

From the editor's desk...

Last month, in Jerusalem, the Israel Museum opened a new exhibit of wide panoramic proportions called Herod the Great: The King's Final Journey. The exhibition has sparked a great deal of excitement and is attracting large numbers of visitors. (Please go to cjnews.com for a story about the exhibit.)

Herod strides imperiously and brutishly through the cities and villages of Judea and, of course, in Jerusalem in the last century BCE. Historians have tried to imagine precisely who he was ever since time, wind and nature's eternal elements buried the broken columns of his spectacular archeological masterpieces in the sand and earthy clumps of the ancient land.

And now, a new book, brings Herod to life once again, enabling us to imagine him afresh, if not actually anew.

Written by Yehuda Shulewitz, Herod: The Man Who Had to be King (Penina Press, 2012) is an ambitious work that sweeps character, drama, intrigue, history, classics and theology into one epic novel.

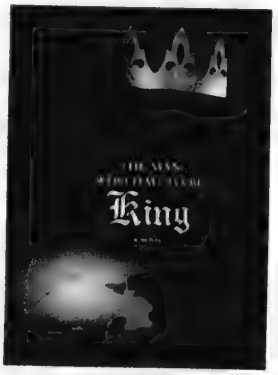
The novel, however, was not completed by Shulewitz. Alas, he died around this time six years ago, during Passover 2007. His wife, Malka Hillel-Shulewitz, a renowned scholar of Jewish history in her own right, completed the work that was ultimately published some five years after the author's death.

Yehuda Shulewitz was a rare multi-disciplined scholar: economist, historian of the Roman classical age and student of archeology. His prodigious research skills are clearly evident in the book. Shulewitz was carefully meticulous about writing into the book the actual details of Roman-Jewish history of Herod's time.

The literary-historical focus of the book, of course, is Herod and his obsessively cruel quest to become the ruler of Judea. But Shulewitz depicts that focus with a very wide lens. He brings us the key figures of Judea, Rome, Parthia, Babylon and Egypt.

Much of western civilization owes its evolution to the seminal events of Judea during Herod's time. Shulewitz helps us to "see" how those events might have unfolded.

Herod plots against the Hasmonean rulers in Jerusalem even as the extended Hasmonean family members plot and intrigue against each other. Rome intervenes. Parthia intervenes. Egypt hovers. Blood flows frequently. Betrayal, treachery, deception, exploitation and cruelty are the political instruments of choice.



Shulewitz was not a literary stylist. His language and idiom are occasionally too modern for the plot he weaves. But nor was it his intention to write literature. Rather, he is a fastidious chronicler of historic detail, a spellbinding storyteller and a master imaginer of dialogue and homily.

Typical of Shulewitz' imagination and erudition is the following instruction by the sage Shemaiah to a group of Shabbat worshippers in the town of Emmaus who seek his guidance regarding the brutal Romans.

"If we could maintain our sovereign independence, this was undoubtedly to be preferred," he declared in a firm voice. "Our unique way of life has not evolved on an abstract, ethereal plane divorced from the realities of life. The Torah deals with and governs every aspect of life, with relations not only between man and his Maker, but also between man and man. The Lord has sanctified us with His commandments, and in a similar vein, the Prophet Isaiah proclaimed that the Holy God is sanctified by justice. The pursuit of justice in its every aspect, enshrining the principle that man is created in the divine image, the hallowing of life – this is the quintessence of our way of life."

Shulewitz has left us a story that far surpasses the "mere" account of Herod's career and his rise over the horrible heap of human ruins that his ambition wrought. He tells us who the Hasmoneans were and he tells us how the Jews lived.

More importantly, he tells us how they survived. It is thus a story of love and reverence of a learned man for his people. As Shulewitz' wife writes in the afterword, "In the ancient world, when a people were conquered it usually accepted the small gods and ways of the conquerors. Not so the Jews for whom Faith, Freedom and Justice were among the signposts that guided them along their way to accomplishing what they believed was their God-given mission – to make the world a better place for all mankind."

Herod: The Man Who Had to be King is a highly entertaining, informative and, very often, inspiring book. –MBD

When someone in your family passes away, you want everything to be done right, according to Jewish tradition. When my mother died, I didn't know half of what these things were. Benjamin's spent time with our family, explaining the significance of every sacred ritual. More than that, they made it ours. It was a beautiful way to honour my dear mother's life.

"They thought of everything."

Rebbetzin Esther Jungreis laments modern-day plagues ranging from cellphones to Europe being "taken over by the Muslim world," but the petite, soft-voiced, charismatic author and advice columnist insists she is an optimist.

In a post-lecture interview at Thornhill's Chabad Flamingo March 10, the rebbetzin said that while she is "a realist," she wouldn't do what she does if she weren't an optimist, too.

Jungreis, who has lectured everywhere from Europe to Russia and South Africa to the Philippines, told The CJN, "I do believe that people can be reached."

A child survivor of the Holocaust, Jungreis moved to New York with her family at age 12. Her father was the scion of a Hungarian rabbinic dynasty that was decimated during the war. She likens today's situation to prewar Germany and sees her role as that of an alarm clock, telling people to "wake up."

Her lecture at Chabad was titled "Life is a Test," the same title as her 2006 book. She has written five books in total, and is working on a sixth. A longtime columnist for the Jewish Press, an Orthodox weekly, Jungreis is also the founder of Hineni, a New York-based outreach organization.

The rebbetzin is still dealing with the after-effects of her own personal test – a fall last Pesach in San Diego that resulted in four fractures, major surgery and subsequent rehab.

She has resumed her work, and now walks with a cane, which she used to effect at the beginning of her hour-long talk, raising it in the air to bless the audience with health and "Yiddishe naches."

The rebbetzin told the crowd of the "message from HaShem" that she inferred from non-Jewish hospital staff in San Diego, who encouraged her to "take one more step," and called her a "ballerina."

Jungreis looked for meaning in the word, remembering that ballerinas "spin, and fall down, but they stand up, and they go on tippy toes."

As well, she thought of the Hebrew sound-alike ba'al rina, meaning "master of joy. "You have to be joyous. God is giving you another day."

Coy about her age, admitting only to being "not 40 years old any more," Jungreis briefly raised the question of retirement, vowing "Never, children.

"Why do I go? Because I love my people," she said. As well, the generation of Holocaust survivors is "quickly disappearing, and those who are here are mostly ill or infirm."

Jungreis has a dual message – her wake-up call about the threat to Israel, and her exhortation to "be a Jew."

"As much as we were sleeping [in prewar Europe], we are sleeping now," she said. "Do you know of any nation that will come to the defence of Israel? Will any nation go to war on behalf of Israel?... Don't kid yourself. Don't be sleeping."

"We are so busy with our iPhones and our iPods, we don't have time, we don't know how to listen."

As well, she noted, the average Jew never prays. "Officially, we pray three times a day, but religious Jews are a small minority... If you pray, God will listen," she said.

Jews have forgotten their heritage, she said. As well, she added, "We have become mean and selfish."

Her father taught her as a child that, "If you learn to smile when you have pain in your heart, you will give strength to others." In turn, the smile will be returned and enter your heart, she said.

"I know that God will not abandon me," she told The CJN. "I remember there is a light at the end of the tunnel, and I remember that in the desert there is always sunshine. But for growth, you need rain and thunderstorms... Life is a journey, and a journey is not always simple."

As well, she urged her audience to keep Shabbat, if not completely, then in part. She likened the weekly Sabbath to "a piece of gold."

Individual efforts matter, and every day counts, she said.

In addition to her appearance at Chabad Flamingo, Rebbetzin Jungreis spoke at Associated Hebrew Schools and returned to the shul the next day to talk to a group of bat mitzvah girls. She will be back in Toronto in the spring to speak at JUMP (Jewish Urban Meeting Place).

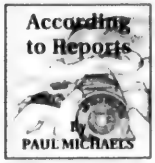
Israeli-Palestinian deal won't solve all woes

According to Reports



BY PAUL MICHAELS

Last week, while Israel was in the process of forming a new government and the Vatican was deliberating over the choice of a new pope, some media attention turned to U.S. President Barack Obama's trip to Israel, which was scheduled to begin March 20.

Journalists reported about the low level of expectation that the U.S. administration was signalling for Obama's first visit as president. Obama would not introduce a new peace plan for Israelis and Palestinians, but rather would be coming to listen to both sides and also to discuss urgent issues such as how to deal with Iran's drive for nuclear weapons. He might even leave Israel early, some speculated, to attend the investiture for the new Pope.

In a March 13 New York Times column, "Mr. Obama goes to Israel," Thomas Friedman put Obama's visit in perspective. "The most destabilizing conflict in the region is the civil war between Shiites and Sunnis that is rocking Lebanon, Syria, Iraq, Kuwait, Bahrain and Yemen. While it would be a good thing to erect a Palestinian state at peace with Israel, the issue today is will there be anymore a Syrian state, a Libyan state and an Egyptian state," he wrote.

Still, the familiar refrain about linkage involving Israel and the wider region figured in Friedman's analysis: "[T]he unresolved Israeli-Palestinian conflict emotionally resonates across the Arab-Muslim world," although solving it is necessary, but not sufficient "for regional stability," he said. Too many pundits have claimed, almost as a matter of course, without any evidence at all, that resolving this conflict is both necessary and sufficient. At least Friedman introduces a bit more realism into the picture in light of regional developments that have nothing to do with Israel and the Palestinians.

However, it might also be argued that the emotionalism Friedman refers to would not be dissipated by a peace agreement between Israel and the Palestinians, because the parties feeding most off anti-Israel passions don't want to see the Israeli-Palestinian conflict solved, they want to see Israel disappear. This of course means that a resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict would not even be a necessary condition for "regional stability" since Israel, within any boundaries as the Jewish State, would remain an unacceptable provocation. That's the view of Iran, Hezbollah, Hamas, the Muslim Brotherhood, etc. – that is, in general, of both Shia and Sunni Islamists. In the meantime, Israel remains a useful cause for recruiting terrorists.

Other parties, mainly Arab secular autocrats, have been quite content for decades to see the Israeli-Palestinian conflict continue, as it conveniently serves to distract attention from their own domestic failures.

This is not to say that an agreement between Israel and the Palestinians is not vital. It is, but it's for the benefit of both Israelis and Palestinians themselves.

When asked by Patrick Martin of the Globe and Mail (March 11) whether he thought it important for Hamas to accept Israel as a Jewish state (the same could have been asked of Fatah), former Shin Bet head Ami Ayalon replied: "No. It is for me to decide on the identity of my state. I'm not going to demand that their future state of Palestine be a democracy."

Ayalon drew the wrong analogy. The issue of identity here concerns peoplehood, not the form of government. The vast majority of Israelis have for many years acknowledged the right of the Palestinian people to statehood, whereas the Palestinians still refuse to acknowledge the same for the Jewish People. This constitutes the wide "peace gap" between the sides. To close the gap recent Israeli governments have emphasized the need to recognize "two states for two peoples," as the United Nations itself envisioned in 1947. It's not sufficient for some Palestinians to say they recognize "Israel" but to then insist on the "return" of potentially millions of Palestinian "refugees" to that state, thereby creating another Arab-majority country.

If there's linkage that really matters, it's to be found in genuine mutual recognition.

For the good of Israel

It took Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu all but one of the 42 days that the law allowed him to form a coalition. But he was finally able to present the news of a new government to President Shimon Peres last Saturday night.

The new, 33rd government of the State of Israel will comprise 68 members of the Knesset from four parties: Likud-Beitenu (31 seats), Yesh Atid (19), Habayit Hayehudi (12) and Hatnua (6). The new Netanyahu government, therefore, will have a seven-seat cushion in the 120-seat Knesset.

Prior to his meeting with President Peres, Netanyhu said "The new government will work together in full cooperation for the benefit of the entire Israeli public. We will act to strengthen the state of Israel's security and to improve the quality of life of its citizens."

These words by Netanyahu were probably spoken, in one way or another, by every incoming Israeli prime minister since the first days of the state in 1948. But this time, the expectations upon the prime minister will be significantly different because the nature of the new coalition is significantly different than past governments.

The coalition is essentially centrist, without the participation of extremist parties of the left or the right and without the participation of the haredi parties, Shas and United Torah Judaism, who will now sit in a 52-strong Knesset opposition led by the Labor party.

Security issues have always dominated the national discussion in Israel. They still do. But there is no disputing that domestic, economic, social and electoral change hovers in the air in Israel. The challenge for the new government will be to steward the country through this change with as little upheaval as possible.

We wish them wisdom, strength, courage and an abiding concern for the others' dignity in leading this stewardship for the good of all Israel.

Their work has already begun. And, as we know, like all service for the public good, it is never-ending.

For the good of the world

We also extend our hopes and wishes to Pope Francis in his newly appointed role as steward of the Catholic Church. The world needs men and women of God who are of overt moral strength and goodness, who celebrate, not fear, difference and diversity in mankind. Men and women of God care for God's creations and care to make the world we inhabit the very best He had in mind for it. If Pope Francis reaches for this wide embrace of all humanity, his ministry will truly be a blessing for the entire world.

Cost of Jewish education

The issue of affordability of day-school education remains the elephant in the room in terms of Jewish communal priorities in Ontario. Everyone knows that the problem exists, yet after the debacles of the past few elections, the issue appears dormant on the communal agenda. Whether the issue is politically dead in Ontario is debatable. Both the former and current leader of the Liberal party bear the primary responsibility for cynically twisting and turning the issue in such a way to render it unpalatable to the vast majority of the Ontario public.

Leo Baeck Day School's tuition subsidy initiative, of up to $5,000 per student for eligible families, is to be lauded as a step in the right direction. The fact that the upper eligibility range of that new initiative reaches salaries of $350,000 should serve as a wake-up call to the entire community as to the true severity of the education-funding problem in Ontario.

Parents in Montreal are finding the fees of $7,000 to $8,000 per year difficult. Those of us in Ontario, where elementary school fees are double that figure, can only say "halevay – would that were the case here!" In the meantime, the problem continues to worsen, slowly rendering Ontario a less-than-desirable place for the younger generation to establish their own Jewish households in the future.

Help Andrew

In connection with the article "TumourCraft technology helps oncologists treat cancer," (March 7), which discusses Andrew Avetikov, who is suffering from a particularly aggressive cancer and needs financial assistance in his dire situation, the Jewish Russian Community Centre has established the JRCC Help Andrew Fund. Members of the community are asked for their support. Donations can be made online at www.jrcc.org/helpandrew, on the phone or by mailing cheques to our offices. One hundred per cent of all donations will be directed toward medical expenses related to Andrew's condition.

Treat all with equal respect at Wall

I cannot understand why anyone would be arrested for praying at the Western Wall ("10 women arrested at Western Wall," Feb. 14). A group of women have gathered at the back of the women's section at the Western Wall for their monthly prayers since 1988. A ban in effect in Israel states that women are not allowed to wear tfillin while praying at the Western Wall. They were arrested for breaking the ban, but they were later released without charge.

I am a 15-year-old Jewish girl and I believe that just because these women chose to display their religion differently than the acccepted Orthodox norm for women praying at the Western Wall does not mean they were wrong. They were standing at the back of the women's section, where they would not have disturbed others. I believe that the Western Wall should be a place where all Jews can pray regardless of their traditions or practice. It is not a private synagogue. It should be open to all forms of Judaism. Everyone must be treated with equal respect.

StandWithUs arranged events for Israelis

The article "Israeli students aim to dispel myths about home" (March 7) failed to acknowledge the significant role played by StandWithUs (SWU) Canada during the visit to Canada of the Israeli student group WordSwap. As a member of SWU Canada's board, I had the wonderful opportunity to share a memorable dinner and conversation with eight of the WordSwap members at interfaith advocate Raheel Raza's home, arranged by Meryle Kates, executive director of SWU Canada.

LET THEM GO...

Ron Arad, Zachary Baumel, Zvi Feldman, Guy Hever, Yehuda Katz

StandWithUs (standwithus.com) arranged many community events for WordSwap's participation. These included a reception at the home of the Canadian director of the International Christian Embassy Jerusalem, Donna Holbrook; participation in the Ignite Christian Conference; presentation of a Purim play and workshop at Catch the Fire Church, and visits to Congregation Darchei Noam and Beth Sholom Synagogue. Together with Hillel, we assisted WordSwap by setting up tables on campus and providing well-received StandWithUs materials. We also helped Hillel co-ordinate Innovation Israel during their visit.

Passover: a fine-tuning of the human soul

Rabbi David Hartman, the founder of the Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem, passed away last month. This is an abridged version of an essay he wrote in 2010.

Rabbi David Hartman

As the festival of Passover draws nearer, the streets of Jerusalem are filled with signs of joyful aspirations and preparation for a major spiritual event in the lives of the Jewish people.

Supermarket shelves are lined with ever-increasing varieties of matzah, families spend the weeks leading up to Passover washing the drapes, the linens, the floors, even rewashing loads of laundry. Everyone talks about cleaning, recipes and kashrut: do you follow the Ashkenazi custom of not eating kitniyot, or do you follow the Sephardi custom? Must you eat shmurah matzah to fulfil the mitzvah on seder night? And exactly how much matzah must you eat to fulfil the mitzvah?

As much as I am happy to be part of the Jewish People preparing for the holiday of Passover, I confess that I am bored by the kinds of conversations I hear around me, by a level of discourse that doesn't seem to get beyond an excessive concern with the minutiae of halachic ritual.

Coupled with the concerns about food, Passover suggests a supernatural model of redemption, which posits that God will break into history and save us just as He did during the Exodus from Egypt. Rather than give weight to our own personal will, responsibility and moral agency, this theological worldview says that the best we can hope for is that God will look down and have mercy on us. It is a way of understanding the holiday that positions us as passive and patient, waiting for an interventionist God to rescue us from our Galut realities.

Does this truly reflect what Passover is about? A memory of miracles? An obsession with rituals? Whatever happened to the dramatic, overarching themes of freedom from oppression, self-governance and spiritual rebirth?

In search of a little religious sobriety, I recently began revisiting the work of Rabbi Mordechai Kaplan, the great 20th-century Jewish thinker and founder of the Reconstructionist movement. The crucial question for Rabbi Kaplan is how do the commandments percolate into the life stream of the Jewish People? How do the rituals shape us ethically? How do the mitzvot propel us to become full human beings and reach our powers of ethical personality? In other words, how does Judaism impact us in the quest for human self-realization? Rabbi Kaplan's philosophy grew out of his quest to understand how the Jewish People created patterns of living with the potential to redeem us from selfishness, narcissism and cruelty, and open us to a world of holiness.

I am very moved by Rabbi Kaplan's thought. He constantly tried to find underlying spiritual and ethical meanings beneath the surface of Passover. He sought to crack open halachic formalism and reveal a deep teleology of spiritual aspiration.

What is the holiday of Passover about? What do we make of our inherited narrative that we recount every year around the seder table? How do we understand its theological implications? What kind of God is the God of Passover? And what are we talking about when we talk about freedom?

For the Jewish medieval philosopher Yehuda Halevi, the Exodus story is the central prism through which to understand the Jewish God, as it illustrates the most fundamental principle of Judaism: God's absolute will and sovereignty over history. For Halevi, it is the miracle of the Exodus that mediates the reality of God. It is this view that Rabbi Kaplan rejects unequivocally. The notion of Judaism as supernaturalism – the idea of a God who is above nature, yet whose interference nature must obey – is anathema to Rabbi Kaplan's thought. Rabbi Kaplan, and his philosophical antecedents, such as Maimonides and Spinoza, did not see nature in opposition to God's will. On the contrary, it was in the very processes of nature that they saw the divine. For Maimonides, God is revealed within the normal patterns of the world, within the natural order of the universe. According to this school of thought, we need not see God as supernatural in order to feel that God is present.

The leader of the seder uncovers the matzah for the benefit of everyone seated around the table at the start of the evening ritual. Rabbi David Hartman urges us to "try to keep alive the ethical implications of the Haggadah." [Flash90 photo]

But a God revealed exclusively in nature is a difficult experience for Jews. I remember after the Six Day War visiting Heichal Shlomo, where people sat for hours recounting miraculous interventions during the war: the bomb that fell into the ark containing Torah scrolls but didn't go off, the Egyptian troops who were about to attack but then suddenly turned away, the sighting of Elijah the prophet. Jews love miracles. Why? Because they can't stand order.

One of the most evocative and psychologically complex parts of the Passover narrative is the hardening of Pharaoh's heart. Maimonides is particularly concerned with the biblical passage that describes the hardening of Pharaoh's heart as an explicit act of God. This is a critical passage for Maimonides, whose entire conception of Judaism is based on the notion of human freedom. How do we explain the hardening of Pharoah's heart? Did God suddenly turn Pharoah into a puppet? Did he take away his human will?

Maimonides provides an answer. He says that none of the biblical instances of God taking away a person's freedom should be read literally. Rather, they should be understood as instances in which an individual brought about a curtailing of freedom as a result of his own actions. It is Maimonides's understanding that human beings can create a habitual form of behaviour that, practised enough over a long enough period of time, obliterates the possibility for change.

Maimonides maintains that it is precisely because God created human beings with rationality that once we begin to seek righteousness and perform good deeds, we have a natural hunger to continue. Those who, of their own initiative, "come to purify themselves," are aided by God. God's "aid," in this sense, is built into the laws of nature – in this case, into the very essence of human nature. God has structured a universe in which human beings are driven by an innate capacity to act righteously. That is the meaning of divine grace. God is not seen in miraculous breakthroughs, but in the very structure of human reason and human nature.

Thus, according to Maimonides, the hardening of Pharaoh's heart is distinctly not an example of God intervening in nature or compromising human will. God created humans in such a way that once we set out on a course in life – noble or nefarious - we become "wired," in a sense, to continue on that path. Based on this reading, God did not harden Pharaoh's heart so much as he created a world in which Pharaoh's ongoing refusal to free the Hebrew slaves gave birth to a self-perpetuating reality. For this reason, Pharaoh represents the antithesis of freedom. He is the embodiment of enslavement, of both the self and the other.

Passover is meant to celebrate and sustain our deep yearning for freedom, not necessarily to show that God can change the order of the universe. Passover is a holiday that inculcates the belief that man will overcome oppression, that freedom will reign throughout the world. The faith that tyranny will ultimately be vanquished is deeply embedded in the significance of Passover.

Yet we must not allow that faith to obscure the need to address the various expressions of modern-day slavery. How do we treat foreigners and immigrants in our society? Do we take seriously the precept not to oppress the stranger because we were strangers in Egypt? The Haggadah calls for nothing less than a seminar on freedom, slavery and oppression. And we should leave the seder table with a new consciousness of what freedom is and what it means to yearn for it.

Redemption is not otherworldly salvation at the end of time. It's not the World to Come or Resurrection of the Dead. For Rabbi Kaplan, redemption is not something that's going to happen at the end of days when we'll all be instructed to pack our bags and welcome the messiah. Redemption is an individual's growth into a complete human being, a person who fulfils all of his or her aptitudes. Redemption is not an abstract philosophical or theological construct, but a fine-tuning of the human soul that helps us to love more and to be more sensitive. It creates a meaningful pattern of self-fulfilment.

Messianic aspiration and hope should act as a normative critique of the status quo in history. Messianism takes us beyond the given and creates hope for new human potential in history. It is not a predictive moment in history but a religious aspiration to redo history in the image of peace and love. It is the mission of these holy days to create conditions within human beings for their personal fulfilment. It is the purpose of the holidays to wake us up to our true capacities, to release the deeper ethical components of what it means to be a human being.

That is the reason it's incumbent upon us to try to keep alive the ethical implications of the Haggadah. If we understand and internalize the true message of Passover, we can develop a whole new response to those without power, and take seriously the opportunity to love the stranger as yourself.

What the PQ's Bill 14 teaches us about Israel

In an interesting overlap, in mid-March, the PQ's restrictive language law, Bill 14, ended up being considered in the Quebec National Assembly just as a dustup began over a New York Times blog post by a philosophy professor named Joseph Levine denying Israel's legitimacy because it dares to be a Jewish State. Bill 14's heavy hand – and, in fact, the restrictiveness of the original Bill 101– helps make the argument why Israel can be a Jewish, democratic and legitimate state, well within the international consensus.

Gil Troy

in Montreal

In Bill 14, Premier Pauline Marois' separatist Quebec government proposes extending the language law to smaller businesses, revoking a municipality's bilingual status when its English population drops to half and depriving military families of their right to send their children to English schools. The separatists cheer this attempt to eliminate some of what they consider the "loopholes" in Bill 101, or what many of us would consider its rare safety valves.

I would have no problem with a bill encouraging the study of French, the use of French and the cultural expression of French in Quebec. As a Zionist, I'm a big fan of positive nationalism and understand a people's need to express and preserve a traditional culture through public displays. But my problem comes from Bill 101's – and now the more oppressive Bill 14's – negative nationalism. It shifts from promoting French to knocking down English, so much so that the Quebec legislature repeatedly has had to invoke the ridiculous notwithstanding clause in Canada's Charter of Rights and Freedoms, basically saying that notwithstanding the basic rights and freedoms this law violates, the legislature is passing this flawed bill.

Israel takes a different approach – especially theoretically, and increasingly in practice, too. Yes, Israel is a Jewish State, seeking to foster a rich, thick, public culture that expresses and preserves Jewish ideas, values, rituals and holidays. Israeli culture, as we know it, also synthesizes traditional Jewish cultural expressions with western sensibilities, all done with the occasional Arabic or Middle Eastern accent added, but with a clear cultural and legal bias for Judaism. However, this bias "for" is also trumped by an important counter-tradition.

Israel's Declaration of Independence promises civic equality to all the country's inhabitants. In the great philosopher Michael Walzer's terms, this recognizes that Israel is not just an exclusive "club" or a "family" but is also a state based on a certain "neighbourhood" or territory, and everyone in that neighbourhood deserves basic legal democratic rights. As a result, there are no oppressive language laws. In fact, English, Arabic and Hebrew signs can be found throughout the country, and I see more English on the streets of Jerusalem than on the streets of Montreal – where the English language is banned, an absurdity in a modern democracy.

With these basic protections, Israeli nationalism – meaning Zionism – can be a positive, not a negative, nationalism. And, thanks to these basic protections, there are Arab Supreme Court justices, Arab Knesset members, Arab celebrities, Arab doctors, Arab lawyers, all thriving in the Jewish state. Of course, Israel sometimes violates its founding ideals and must work harder to ensure that all Arabs face no discrimination – but theoretically, especially, I am far more comfortable with the Israeli approach than the separatist Quebec approach.

And yet, for all the delightful democratic duality of the Israeli situation, for all the compelling complexity of its legal and ideological posture, this is the country regularly singled out for censure, this is the nation whose basic legitimacy is questioned, in the New York Times, throughout Europe, and, in much uglier ways, throughout the Arab and Muslim worlds.

This demonization is disproportional. There seems to be an endless supply of indignation directed toward the Jewish state. And these kinds of existential attacks, these kinds of sweeping, one-sided rejections of Israel's right to exist, these negations of all the good it does and tries to do, invite a deep pessimism. These kinds of arguments and this kind of obsession transcend questions of borders and boundaries, of settlements and of settling accounts.

When we see intellectuals, when we hear progressives, and when we read academics joining the pile-on against Israel, we need to confront them. We should challenge their arguments. We must point out that they're enabling the fanatics. And we need to accuse them of being obstacles to peace in perpetuating these untruths.

Pushing the halachic envelope for women

I share with my readers this month parts of the tribute I gave at Rabbi David Hartman's shloshim gathering in Toronto.

I've been patronizingly reminded by many Orthodox rabbis in my life that "men and women are different, so they have different roles and different rules, and why are you so upset about it?" – which takes a deep and profound question of the nature of gender, humanity and the religious enterprise and turns it into a "one unhappy feminist" scenario unbefitting the seriousness of the theological challenge.

But I've been equally privileged to meet deeply thoughtful Orthodox rabbis who have struggled with Judaism's gender inequalities, not as a statement of "Oh those poor, angry women who don't understand the beauty of Judaism's gender roles" but as part and parcel of their inquiry into a sustainable Judaism. Chief among them, ahead of his time and public in his discourse on women and Halachah, was my teacher, Rabbi David Hartman. Studying with him shook my preconceived notions about the intractability of this issue, for he wrote and practised an Orthodoxy that was engaged and wrestling meaningfully with the traditional boundaries of women's participation and – more importantly – with a Halachah that preaches the full human dignity of women, but doesn't always practise it.

He rested on an underlying principle that is stronger than any "piecemeal" solution giving women access to this thing or that, or giving temporary "permissions" for women to participate in this activity or that. In his book A Heart of Many Rooms, he writes, "It is not only to legal norms that we owe our allegiance, but also to the values and the human character that these attempt to realize." He constantly taught that his halachic innovations around women were an attempt to realize the values of human dignity that Judaism teaches.

In his last book, The God Who Hates Lies, he attacks the condescending methodologies of discourse. In speaking about the refusal of the Orthodox establishment in Israel to solve the problem of agunot – women whose husbands won't give them a Jewish divorce, creating a lifetime of anguish and isolation – he questions the halachist who said, seemingly empathetic of the agunot, "It's my personal Akeidah!" Not being able or ready or willing to halachically solve the problem of thousands of chained women was the rabbi's own personal test of faith? Hartman boldly asked, "Your Akeidah? Is that supposed to bring comfort to the abandoned woman whose life is passing her by?"

But perhaps he is most well known among those who struggle with Judaism's gender biases for his courageous and landmark decision to support the establishment of Shira Hadasha in Jerusalem, the first "partnership minyan" where separate-seating Orthodox davening is the norm, along with women having aliyot and reading Torah and leading certain parts of the service from their side of the mechitzah (which retracts, by the way, for the Torah reading and for the dvar Torah.) Of this he wrote, "I became unable to justify women's exclusion from a minyan; why should they be denied the religious dignity that comes with full communal participation, treated, in essence, as if they were not there? I cannot be bound, or insist that others be bound, by a halachic theology that privileges certain kinds of sperm, wombs, and genes and stigmatizes others."

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

in Toronto

He did not support Shira Hadasha because it made women feel better. He supported Shira Hadasha because he rejected the halachic theology that privileges men. What's more, he rejected the notion that biology is spiritual destiny, that there is an essential, existential "female nature" of woman that is eternal and factually true. Rabbi Hartman writes, "Is the woman we see walking the streets today the woman of the Talmud? No authority in the world can convince me that she is; no past authority can make it into a reality… So then this creates the conflict: The God who loves permanence wants us to deny what we experience, while the God who hates lies wants us to give it credence."

The God who demands I be truthful, Rabbi Hartman would say, is the God who brings the truth of gender inequality onto my tongue and into open, listening ears.

Rabbi Hartman was, for me, a mighty partner in this particular tikkun olam, which the God who hates lies is still waiting to see completed.

Historian launched an overdue debate in Poland

"I'm not defaming anyone," said the Polish American historian Jan Gross, a tall, angular man with a shock of snow-white hair. "I'm just trying to tell the truth."

Gross, 66, a professor of war and society at Princeton University in Princeton, N.J., was rebutting criticism of his books, which have hit a raw nerve in some Polish quarters.

For about a decade now, Gross has been no stranger to controversy, having written three hard-hitting accounts of the Holocaust and the postwar period in Poland that have polarized public opinion in his native land and the Polish diaspora.

Sheldon Kirshner
in Toronto

Neighbors: The Destruction of the Jewish Community in Jedwabne, Poland, published in 2001 and a National Book Award finalist, explores a pogrom in a Nazi-occupied Polish town in the summer of 1941 in which upward of 1,600 Jews were slaughtered by their Catholic neighbours.

Fear: Antisemitism in Poland after Auschwitz, published five years later, examines the hostility and violence to which Polish Jews were subjected upon returning to their homes in Poland after World War II.

Golden Harvest, which he wrote with his wife, Irena Grudzinska, came out last year and focuses on Polish "diggers" who sifted through the ashes and remains of murdered Jews in the Treblinka extermination camp in the hope of finding jewelry and dental gold overlooked by the Nazis. The gruesome activity they engaged in, he suggests, was a metaphor for the plunder of Jewish wealth during and after the Holocaust in Poland.

These books, two of which have been bestsellers, have brought Gross a measure of fame and notoriety and played a significant role in cracking open Polish collective memory of a dark epoch and launching a long-deferred debate on the explosive subject.

More to the point, Gross has been instrumental in exploding a cherished national myth that Poles, rather than having been solely victims of the brutal Nazi occupation, were also oppressors.

Critics have lambasted Gross, denigrating his methodology, questioning his facts and claiming he traded in stereotypes, prejudices and common gossip. A few have even claimed he was intent on damaging Poland's international image.

In a nasty reference to Neighbors, Lech Walesa, the Solidarity trade unionist and a former president of Poland, contemptuously dismissed Gross as "a mediocre writer" and "a Jew who tries to make money." Norman Davies, the British historian, claimed Neighbors was "deeply unfair" to Poles.

Walesa's cutting remarks do not bother Gross in the least. "Someone slipped these words into his writing. He's a good man. He didn't read Neighbors. This is my supposition. He was under the influence of a very nationalist, antisemitic priest, Father Henryk Jankowski." As for Davies, he said, "What happened in Jedwabne was unfair to Jews, not Poles."

Jews in Poland have climbed on the anti-Gross bandwagon, too.

Marek Edelman, one of the leaders of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, condemned Fear, claiming that postwar violence against Jews in Poland was rooted in banditry rather than antisemitism. In a commentary on Golden Harvest, the chief rabbi of Poland, Michael Schudrich, observed, "Gross writes in a way to provoke, not to educate."

Responding to their attacks, Gross said that Edelman backed away from his original assessment, and brushed off Rabbi Schudrich's comment as "silly."

Among liberal Poles and Holocaust survivors, Gross has been praised as an important voice.

Agnieszka Magdziak-Miszewska, a former deputy editor of the Catholic magazine Znak, wrote that "the painful truth of Jedwabne" was "the most serious test that we Poles have had to confront in the last decade." The novelist Elie Wiesel, in a review of Fear, observed it had forced Poles to reflect on their checkered past.

To Gross – a graduate of Warsaw University who emigrated from Poland with his parents in 1969 after being briefly imprisoned by the Communist regime for his involvement in a student protest movement – the reason why he has come under such sharp scrutiny is clear.

"My critics are deeply wed to a nationalist version of Polish history and are unwilling to face the truth about Poland's past," he said in a recent interview in Toronto. "It's a narrative in which Poles are viewed as victims who can't do wrong. But there are a lot of Poles, including members of the Catholic intelligentsia, who view things in a completely open-minded way."

Asked to describe his enemies, he replied, "People who are ignorant and unwilling to learn about history."

Yet he admits that the slings and arrows have been hurtful. "It saddens me that a segment of the public refuses to think openly about the past." He hastened to add that he has never had an unpleasant public encounter in Poland. "On the contrary, people have come up to me to thank me."

His books, he said, have "unblocked the story of Jewish persecution at the hands of their [Polish] neighbours."

Jan Gross

As a result, this issue is "openly and honestly" debated today. "I would say there has been a progressive opening up of Polish minds. Poles are increasingly looking at the Holocaust objectively."

He is particularly pleased that a group of Polish historians, namely Jan Grabowski and Barbara Engel-King, do not flinch from exposing "Polish collusion" during the Holocaust.

Under the shadow of Nazism, Poles suffered greatly and heroically and helped Jews, paying the price in some instances for their decency, he noted.

Yet far too many Poles participated in the persecution and murder of Jews, or denounced them to the Germans. "This is a story we have to tell," he said.

In 12 villages within the vicinity of Jedwabne, in Wasosz and Radjilow, for example, hundreds of Jews were murdered by Poles. In his judgment, these events would not have happened without Nazi provocation.

Gross said that Polish-language books about these atrocities are currently being translated into foreign languages, including French and English.

A visiting fellow at Yad Vashem in 2012, he began writing on Polish-Jewish themes after concluding that historians had portrayed wartime Polish-Jewish relations incorrectly. "There wasn't much written on it, but it was claimed that Poles were either unable to help Jews or had provided as much assistance as possible."

Rejecting this perhaps self-serving analysis, Gross said that wartime Polish-Jewish relations were generally unfriendly. There was a yawning chasm between Poles and Jews, with the blatant antisemitism of the prewar era having decisively influenced Polish attitudes toward Jews.

Being the son of an assimilationist Jewish father who was a lawyer and sociologist and a Catholic mother who translated French literature into Polish and helped save her husband during the Holocaust, Gross seems ideally placed to ponder the depths and intricacies of Polish-Jewish relations, past and present.

And while he believes that antisemitism in contemporary Poland is a serious phenomenon, he takes solace from the belief that Poland's younger generation is enlightened.

Not surprisingly, Gross is optimistic about the future of Polish democracy, which supplanted four decades of communism almost 25 years ago. "It's doing fine," he said.

Seminar takes moms 'Beyond the Diaper Bag'

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

For young mothers looking to entertain their little ones, there's no shortage of baby-centred programming. But Jane Farkas, organizer of a new initiative called Mommy Talks, says it's time someone thought about the moms, too.

Farkas, a 28-year-old mother of three kids under the age of five, spoke with The CJN about the launch of Mommy Talks, a new program designed for Jewish mothers who want to better themselves for their families and contribute to their community in positive ways.

The first annual seminar titled "Beyond the Diaper Bag," to be held April 7 at the Prosserman Jewish Community Centre, is the brainchild of Farkas, who runs Aish HaTorah's AishCampus Thornhill program with her husband, Rabbi Erez Farkas.

Although her job requires her to work with Jewish students, Farkas said she got the itch to reach out to fellow Jewish moms following the birth of her youngest daughter.

"I started a blog because I needed an outlet. It's called AwesomeMommy.ca. Then I started a mommy group at my house with a friend who was on maternity leave," she said.

"I wanted to do something because... the 'Mommy and Me' groups at the mall are all good, but they're all baby-centred."

But it wasn't until Farkas read the best-seller Prisoner in Tehran by Iranian-Canadian author Marina Nemat that she was compelled to organize an event tailored to busy moms who don't want to lose themselves in loads of laundry and diaper duty.

"A few months ago, I read that book, and I was appalled at myself that I didn't know that Iran used to be a normal country. When I finished reading the book, I said to my husband, 'Did you know that Iran was a normal country? And he said, 'I think that's common knowledge, Jane,'" she recalled.

Jane Farkas, here with her youngest daughter, Pnina, is the organizer of Mommy Talks, which presents its first annual seminar in April.

"It's not like I live under a rock. I'm a well-read, educated person. I have a bachelor's degree, but I still didn't know that."

Upon reflecting on the books she has read since her children were born, it occurred to her that they were all pregnancy or parenting books.

"I couldn't handle the idea that my entire life had become carpool, snacks, lunches and after-school activities. I love being a mom, but there just has to be something more to life than just that."

Farkas hopes this upcoming event, sponsored by Aish Toronto, the Prosserman JCC and the DANI Toronto, which helps special-needs adults develop life skills, will inspire women to "take care of themselves, the community and eventually the world."

She said this introductory seminar will touch on a range of different topics, including how to start a blog, honing your time-management skills, mom-friendly fashion tips, and the importance of being accountable and improving the world.

Children are welcome, of course, as there will be programming led by certified early childhood educators running simultaneously, which will keep moms free to enjoy the lectures, break-out sessions, a catered sit-down lunch and a raffle.

The raffle alone is worth the price of admission, Farkas said.

"I have a storage room full of stuff – way over $3,000 worth of stuff. I have hair straighteners, gift baskets, jewelry. It's insane."

But it's the women who will be addressing a capacity crowd of 100 mothers that lends this seminar credibility.

The keynote speaker and the inspiration for the event, Marina Nemat, who often speaks out about her experience being imprisoned and tortured in Iran following the 1979 Islamic Revolution, will talk about making the world a better place.

Farkas has also invited Margaret Wallis-Duffy, founder of a multidisciplinary wellness centre called Wallis for Wellness; Ro Little, the president and CEO of mommyblogdesigns.com; Dr. Tara Bloom, who focuses on feeding and nutrition for infants, as well as fertility issues; Jessica Kaplan, M for Mendocino's brand director, and Kathy Laszlo, co-founder and co-director of DANI Toronto.

"Margaret will be talking about making sure that mommies are well and mentally healthy so that they can provide for their kids," Farkas said.

"Jessica, who is the brand manager for M for Mendocino... is going to present about spring trends just to help mommies put together an outfit that goes beyond your Lululemon outfit. Or you can go to Ro's session, who'll talk about getting online, how to start a blog, how to make money from a blog."

Farkas added that she didn't realize until recently that the seminar takes place on Yom Hashoah, Holocaust Remembrance Day, so she invited Jody Spiegel, the director of the Holocaust Survivor Memoirs Program at the Azrieli Foundation, to present a short Holocaust memorial video to commemorate the day.

Students fundraise for Send a Kid to Camp

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

La'azor is an organization of nine students who want to make a difference through passion, creativity and fun.

"We are realistic, but we know that if you can change even one person's life, then you have changed the world," said founding member David Tock, 23. "We want to become better people, so we work together, learning about current events and global issues that might not be covered on the national news."

Tock, who is currently a biology student at York University, started the organization in October 2012 after being inspired by the values he gained at Camp Northland-B'nai Brith. He said La'azor takes an innovative approach when it comes to fundraising and strives for originality.

The members of La'azor – which means "to help" in Hebrew – meet once a week to discuss issues ranging from animal treatment to Israel and politics. "Generally, we cover topics that the members might be aware of but could use a bit more of an understanding," Tock said, "and topics that they might not have any idea of but are still serious issues that exist in the world."

Beyond discussion and learning, Tock said the group also works on planning events to help raise money for charities or causes that the members are passionate about. Their March 2 Bar Mitzvah Bash was a big milestone.

Through ticket sales, fundraising and a silent auction at the party, La'azor chose to support the Jewish Camp Council of Toronto's Send a Kid to Camp Foundation and Save a Child's Heart – an Israeli non-profit organization that provides free cardiac surgery for infants and children from underprivileged areas.

Tock said the event was a success, which has "really added a lot of fuel to the fire. We want to continue helping others and continue learning. I think our immediate future will be more based on volunteering as a group, trying to arrange for some speakers to come in and provide a bit more of a focus on gaining a perspective beyond what we are exposed to on a daily basis."

Since many kids and young adults are constantly bringing attention to serious world issues, Tock said having a group like La'azor is necessary. "It allows us to come together and become aware, and in turn advocate for others who need to be heard."

New kosher bakery opens at Bathurst and York Downs

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

A little more than one year after Richman's Kosher Bakery closed its doors, a new kosher bakery under different ownership is opening in the same spot on Bathurst Street.

The similarly named Richmond Kosher Bakery, supervised by the Kashruth Council of Canada, which administers the COR hechsher, was set to be open briefly before Passover and will open permanently after the holiday, say its owners, Ben Raz and Dmitri Arabov.

The new store is in the same location as Richman's, which occupied the spot for nearly 50 years. It closed in December 2011, a victim of rising costs and increased competition.

Raz said that the brightly lit, roomy new store has been totally renovated, complete with two separate ovens for dairy and pareve baked goods.

Arabov, who studied at a culinary school in Israel for two years and has also worked in Europe, said the store features breads, bagels, buns, pastries and fine cakes.

"We have whole wheat, dark rye bread, whole wheat, multigrain and water challah, and organic spelt, and kamut bread," he said.

Special for the Shabbat after Passover, he said, Richmond will have the traditional key challah.

"We also have sugar-free muffins sweetened with natural organic agave nectar, and quinoa cookies and muffins."

Among Arabov's 15 or 20 varieties of cakes are a Mozart cake with hazelnut and meringue, a caramel crunch cake, a flour-free sponge cake with raspberries and filled with dark chocolate mousse and pareve milk chocolate mousse made from rice milk, croquembouche and dulce de leche.

The owners also plan to have some tables set up for customers to enjoy coffee and fresh daily sandwiches.

Raz said that when the new "Richmond" sign went up, a number of people phoned and dropped in to see when the store would be opening.

"They're looking forward to it," he said.

"Richman's was in this spot for a long time. The customers are happy to see another kosher bakery opening."

Four generations practice philanthropy

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

Torontonians Harold and Esther Mecklinger left a legacy of philanthropy. Now in its fourth generation, the family continues to contribute to the community, locally, in Israel and internationally.

The community will have an opportunity to pay tribute to the Mecklinger family on May 9 at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

Alan Mecklinger, Harold and Esther's son, is a developer and landlord of industrial commercial plazas, and Alan's wife, Elise, is the author of several award-winning cookbooks. Both are active volunteers, and now their children are following in their footsteps.

"The Mecklinger family has made their mark in the Toronto community," said Mike Feldman, chair of the Mecklinger family tribute committee.

He added that the family has contributed "their hearts and resources" to many worthy causes, among them, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Baycrest, Mount Sinai and Princess Margaret hospitals, the Breast Cancer Foundation, Koffler Centre of the Arts, the Jewish National Fund and many others.

For generations, the Mecklingers have been active members and supporters of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

Seated, from left, are Alan Mecklinger; Brooke, granddaughter, daughter of Kailee and Shawn; Elise Mecklinger, and Dylan, grandson, and son of Kailee and Shawn. Standing, from left, Pam and Jordy Mecklinger, daughter-in-law and son of Alan and Elise; Dave Mecklinger, son of Alan and Elise; Kailee, daughter-in-law; Corey, son of Kailee and Shawn, grandson of Alan and Elise, and Shawn Mecklinger, son of Alan and Elise.

A highlight of the tribute will be the screening of the 90-minute documentary, A.K.A. Doc Pomus, on the extraordinary life of Brooklyn-born Jerome Solon Felder (1925-1991), a son of Jewish immigrants who used the stage name Doc Pomus.

Alan and Elise Mecklinger, along with Honey and Barry Sherman, are the executive producers of the documentary, and Will Hechter is the producer.

Doc is credited with writing more than 1,500 popular songs, including Save the Last Dance for Me, This Magic Moment, Viva Las Vegas, Can't Get Used to Losing You and Teenager in Love.

The documentary follows young Jerome, who was paralyzed by polio as a child, as he became a blues singer and then a songwriter and lyricist of some of the greatest hit songs recorded by top stars, including Elvis Presley.

A.K.A. Doc Pomus opened the New York Jewish Film Festival at the Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts on Jan. 9.

Doc was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1992, and he was the first white person inducted into the Rhythm and Blues Hall of Fame.

Elise and Alan said they became involved with the film because it makes a significant contribution to the body of knowledge about the impact that Jews have had in shaping American art and culture.

The host for the evening is former sports broadcaster Terry Leibel, who was on the Canadian national equestrian team in the 1970s.

The honorary chairs of the Mecklinger tribute evening include Paul Godfrey, Harry Gorman, Will and Linda Hechter, and Tom and Anna Koffler.

For more information or to make reservations, contact Claire Horowitz at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, 416-633-3838, ext. 242, or visit www.beby.org.

Competition seen as beneficial for consumers

That's in line with the thinking of the late Rabbi Moshe Feinstein, a leading 20th-century halachic decisor, who suggested it was not proper for an outside rabbi to supervise within the jurisdiction of an established organization.

Rabbi Pollak emphasized that while a national kashrut agency might supervise a chain of supermarkets, a single store is more appropriately served by a local certifier.

"I'm not going to say there aren't instances, individual rabbis, or even organizations who, for whatever reason, try to come in and certify an establishment. From my experience, this is a result of some other deep-seated rivalries or something else going on," he said.

But "the vast majority of organizations would very strongly disapprove of such a thing."

He added that "it's certainly not for the benefit of kosher consumers," and that Star-K, like the Kashruth Council, subsidizes local kashrut supervision using revenue from larger-scale industrial clients.

It's unlikely that competing hechshers would drive down the cost of local supervision for non-industrial clients, he said. "If it is… cheaper, they're only doing it to undercut the local organization and for some reason want to do it at a loss."

In the manufacturing realm, however, competition is generally considered beneficial to consumers and manufacturers, Rabkin said.

The March 2013 list of new Star-K-supervised companies shows the agency will go anywhere and everywhere, including Guatemala (for fruit blends and purées), Spain (olives), India (herbal extracts), Sri Lanka (coconut products), and even the GTA, where Star-K supervises Krinos Foods olive oil, among other food products.

"There's no rivalry, no turf warfare in any sense," Rabbi Pollak said.

The Kashruth Council has also expanded over the last five years, Rabkin said, certifying manufacturers "not only in Canada but in the United States, Israel, Europe, South America and Asia."

Rabbi Benjamin Lisbon of the Los Angeles-based Kosher Supervision of America said, "Many companies around the world are seeking a certifying agency that can position them into the marketplace."

Unlike the Kashruth Council and Star-K, KSA doesn't supervise local eateries or caterers at all. Created 20 years ago in response to "a tremendous call for more west-coast certification," KSA today supervises companies worldwide. In Canada, the hechsher is most commonly seen on baked goods such as Ace Bakery baguettes and New Moon Kitchen cookies.

"Whether they export it to the U.S. or Israel… [clients want] a symbol that can bring them outside their own little community."

Steven Bager of Toronto, who started Grain-Free JK Gourmet with his wife in 2001, wanted a hechsher that's widely recognized in the United States.

He approached "probably half a dozen" agencies, including the Kashruth Council, Star-K, the Orthodox Union (OU) and KSA. The OU was probably best known, but also more expensive.

"We decided on KSA, because we wanted to have a broader impact than what COR could provide us," Bager said.

Historian evokes prewar Jewish Warsaw

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Warsaw, the centre of the Jewish universe in Poland, was the biggest Jewish city in Europe prior to the Holocaust.

The Jewish areas of Warsaw exuded a spirit of raw energy and dynamism. And now they're all gone, destroyed by the Nazis in only a few years.

Pre-World War II Warsaw, inhabited by more than 350,000 Jews representing about one-third of its population, was evoked by historian Samuel Kassow in a March 11 lecture at the Centre for Jewish Studies at the University of Toronto.

Kassow, a professor of history at Trinity College in Hartford, Conn., described Warsaw, the Polish capital, as a hub of Yiddish literature, theatre and journalism and a meeting place between Jewish and Catholic Poles.

As the citadel of communications, manufacturing, distribution and banking in Poland, Warsaw was home to the largest Jewish proletariat in Europe, he noted in his lecture, titled "Warsaw as a Jewish Metropolis."

Since the Holocaust, many Jews have regarded Poland as a graveyard, said Kassow, a consultant to the Museum of the History of Polish Jews, which is officially scheduled to open in Warsaw in April 2014.

But until that unprecedented disaster, which consumed approximately 90 per cent of Polish Jewry, Poland, with Warsaw at its apex, was one of the most important centres in the Diaspora, he added.

Warsaw's Jewish population markedly increased in the 19th century as Lithuanian Jews, known as Litvaks, and Polish Jews from the countryside migrated to the city.

There was "little love lost" between Lithuanian and Polish Jews, at least at first, and Polish nationalists accused the Litvaks of being Russian agents. But in time, the Litvaks were fully accepted and became the founders of Warsaw's leading Yiddish dailies.

Samuel Kassow

By 1939, when Poland was invaded and occupied by Nazi Germany, the majority of its Jewish residents had come from somewhere else.

Warsaw, the epitome of diversity, brought together a throbbing mélange of secular and religious Jews of all stripes and beliefs: Zionists, assimilationists, Chassidim, socialists and communists.

But to some Polish Catholics and assimilated Jews, the lively Jewish districts of Warsaw appeared exotic and alien.

Courtyards were a distinctive feature in Jewish neighbourhoods, with some having more inhabitants than rural shtetls, Kassow said.

Separate worlds onto themselves, these courtyards were crammed with residential dwellings, workshops, offices, stores, synagogues and institutions. And as the Polish-born novelist Isaac Bashevis Singer once wrote, a person could easily spend his or her entire life within its precincts.

Warsaw was truly a melting pot, Kassow suggested.

There was a great chassidic community, with the Ger dynasty dominating its ranks and playing an integral role in the modernization of Polish Jewish Orthodoxy.

The Zionist movement was a major force, but Zionism lost its edge after the British authorities in Palestine imposed immigration restrictions.

Polish perceptions to the contrary, only five per cent of Jews supported Communism.

By the late 1930s, Kassow went on to say, the Bundists, consisting of Jewish socialists enjoyed the support of a majority of Warsaw's Jews.

Jewish Warsaw, too, had a strong underworld, and gangsters established their own synagogues, said Kassow.

The high point of Polish-Jewish relations occurred during and after the 1863 uprising against the Russian empire. Eventually, however, Poles turned on Jews, regarding them as "the threatening other," and the relationship between Poles and Jews soured, "never to be good again," Kassow said.

Among Catholic Poles, a consensus developed that Jews were foreigners and should emigrate. Meanwhile, Polish Jews fought hard for their civic rights, but it was "an uphill battle," he said.

On the eve of World War II, Kassow stated, most Jews in Poland wanted to be identified as "proud, self-respecting" Jews rather than as "Poles of the Mosaic persuasion."

Students to be part of Shoah poster contest

Canadian post-secondary students in graphic arts and design are being asked to participate in an international Holocaust remembrance poster competition.

The contest, sponsored jointly by Yad Vashem and the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance (IHRA), will showcase 20 Canadian-made posters that will compete against submissions from the United Kingdom, the Czech Republic and Israel.

Jason Kenney

It's all for "the privilege of having their design displayed at over 90 locations around the world, including the United Nations headquarters in New York City and the European Commission in Brussels," according to a statement by the Minister for Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism Jason Kenney.

Canada assumed the chairmanship of the IHRA earlier this month.

This year's contest theme is titled "Keeping the Memory Alive – Journeys through the Holocaust."

The contest will be judged on International Holocaust Remembrance Day, Jan. 27, 2014. At that time, an international panel of experts in both "design and Holocaust education" will award 500 euros in cash to the winner. Second place will receive 300 euros, with third place getting 200 euros.

The 12 best designs will be exhibited around the world to mark the 2014 International Holocaust Remembrance Day and will be made available as an educational resource, according to the ministry.

"Our government believes it is critically important to be engaged in efforts to commemorate and teach the lessons of the Holocaust to help prevent future acts of genocide," Kenney said.

The deadline for submissions of final designs is April 30. For more information on eligibility requirements or to submit a design, email holocaust-poster@cic.gc.ca and specify "Holocaust poster competition" in the subject line.

Violinist and cantor give spellbinding performance

The sold-out Sing for the Children benefit concert for Chai Lifeline brought together the internationally acclaimed violinist, Yitzhak Perlman, and celebrated cantor, Yitzchak Meir Helfgot.

The melding of Perlman's soulful sounds and skilful mastery of the violin combined with Helfgot's spellbinding tenor gave the audience at the Roy Thomson Hall in Toronto an exceptional experience of communication between violin and voice.

From the rousing opening of Shalom Aleichem, the program of Yiddish folksongs, chassidic melodies, eastern European Jewish folk music, cantorial masterpieces and spirited klezmer music had the enthusiastic audience clapping in appreciation of the master musicians.

Helfgot's rendition of My Yiddishe Momme, together with Perlman's serenely splendid playing, was an emotional trip for young and old alike.

Helfgot's interpretation of R'tzeh, a pleading prayer from the daily liturgy; Mizmor L'Dovid, the Psalm of David traditionally sung on the Sabbath, and the joyful Yiddish folk song A Dudele (A Song to You) provided evidence of the unique art form that is the young cantor's singing.

The accompanying orchestra, comprising 25 musicians from the Klezmer Conservatory Band and the Eternal Echoes Chamber Orchestra, was conducted by Russell Ger and performed arrangements written by Hankus Netsky.

Laura Lowenberg, 18, a special guest from Montreal, spoke of her four-year battle with a rare brain cancer. She had two major surgeries, followed by a stroke. She paid tribute to Chai Lifeline and its many volunteers and programs that helped her and her family through the devastating ordeal. The brave, articulate teenager received a standing ovation.

The money raised at the sixth annual Chai Lifeline concert on March 11 will provide support for children with severe illnesses and their families.

As people left the concert hall, one could hear many express their enthusiasm for the concert. "It was the greatest concert. It was spectacular," one audience member was overheard to say.

Chai Lifeline helps sick children and parents

"Chai Lifeline is always there for anyone who needs help," said Shani Goldner whose son, Nachman, has cerebral palsy.

Nachman, 10, who has six brothers and sisters, is the only child in the family with a disability.

"Nachman does well cognitively," said his mother, "but physically he can't walk. At home, we have built things to accommodate him."

She told The CJN about her gratitude to Chai Lifeline for sending volunteers to her home to help with Nachman and the other children, and provide them with a camping experience, the Shining Star after-school program and many other services.

"It gives us some respite and allows the family to do things together that Nachman cannot do," she said.

Chai Lifeline Canada is a not-for-profit organization headquartered in Toronto. It was started seven years ago under the leadership of Rabbi Mordechai Rothman, who understood that when a child is diagnosed with a serious pediatric or chronic illness, the sick child, as well as siblings and parents, need support.

For children with cancer, dysautonomia, muscular dystrophy, Crohn's disease, cerebral palsy, Pelizaeus–Merzbacher disease (PMD), Soto syndrome and genetic diseases, Chai Lifeline has a multitude of programs and services.

"We have become exceptional at what we do because we have built on the knowledge and the expertise of International Chai Lifeline," said Craig Fried, director of development of Chai Lifeline Canada.

"However, our funding is completely separate from the international organization," he added.

Fried said that if a child in Canada needs counselling, tutoring, financial aid or wants to attend a summer camp, the funds are raised here and the services are free of charge.

The organization has 150 loyal volunteers who give their time to support Chai Lifeline's big-brothers and big-sisters program.

"The volunteers visit our kids at the hospital and at home, and they help us with many other programs," Fried said.

"Our donors are honestly my heroes. They truly make this all possible. Our work is never done, as we are growing every day with more referrals from the Hospital for Sick Children and from the community."

He added that Chai Lifeline wants the community, the schools and synagogues to know it is there for them.

"They should reach out to us for support. Our motto is 'Fighting Illness with Love,'" Fried said. "We are dedicated to meeting the social and emotional need of the children, as well as their families. Many times financial devastation occurs for the family."

Chai Lifeline operates family retreats, special sibling programs, offers peer and professional support, trips to Disneyland in Florida and other locations, and runs two extraordinary camp programs for seriously ill children.

Camp Simcha in upstate New York, has two-week sessions, and Camp Simcha Special expands on the Camp Simcha model to fit the needs of children with severe needs that require continuous medical management.

"This helps the children and their families retain a sense of normalcy," Fried said, "and gives the parents much-needed respite."

Parents of 'lone soldiers' discuss support group

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

In the past few years, a substantial infrastructure has arisen in Israel and abroad to provide support to "lone soldiers" – volunteers from abroad who serve in the Israel Defence Forces (IDF).

Lone soldiers have facilities set aside for them, rights to various perks, organizations advocating on their behalf, all in a bid to make their lives away from home more manageable.

But what about their parents? The soldiers may be alone while serving in Israel, but their parents are thousands of miles away, wanting the best for them, but often without the information or wherewithal to provide them parental support.

Sigal Almog

Last week, about 30 parents and grandparents of lone soldiers, or those about to enlist, gathered in the home of Perla and Ron Riesenbach to lay the foundation for a support group.

They heard from a spokesperson for the Association for the Soldiers of Israel, who answered their questions about resources available for their children; they also heard from Shira Forman, a lone soldier who recently completed her service, who described her experiences navigating lone soldier issues, and they traded information about the subject parents most like to talk about – their kids.

"For me, the group is a support system for Canadian parents with a son or daughter in the Israeli army. Some parents feel so alone and helpless and don't know what they can do to help their child with a problem," said Perla Riesenbach, whose son, Ariel, is serving in the IDF.

Referring to parents who attended the information session, she said that "there was a couple whose son has had many problems and they didn't know what they could do about it from here. Now they do. They're surely not the only set of parents in that situation. Parents have to know that they're not alone, [that] there is some sort of 'customer service' that they can access. Basically, just like there is support for the soldiers in Israel, this is support for the parents in Canada."

Todd Greenbloom, whose 20-year-old daughter, Jenna, is serving in the IDF, said he was worried about her during Operation Cast Lead. A support group would have helped him, he said.

"It's like any kind of support group. When you're going through [something], it's helpful to have somebody going through the same thing. It's empathy."

While quite a few people asked about his daughter, it's different when there are others going through the same thing, he said.

A recurring theme in his conversations with other parents "is the thirst for information for ourselves and to raise awareness in our children to be able to advocate for their own rights in Israel," Ron Riesenbach said.

A number of speakers and parents noted that lone soldiers are eligible for all sorts of benefits – such as the right to be granted permission for a visit home – but they must actively pursue those rights.

A secondary agenda for the proposed group is for parents to interact, share information and provide support to each other, Riesenbach said.

"We're an information organization and a self-support organization," he stated. The meeting was intended to gauge interest in creation of a support group that might meet a few times a year and remain in contact through social media, he added.

Sigal Almog's daughter, Shiri, is currently serving in the IDF. Born in Israel, Shiri and the family moved to Toronto when she was 10. "It was always her intention to go," Almog said. "She's so Israeli. Even though she came here, she stayed there."

Almog came to the information session because, "I want to meet other people like me and see what they think and they are going through.

"I was in the army. I know about it. I had a brother killed in the army. My only concern is that she's there and I'm here. If she needs anything, I can't help her."

Almog hoped she could learn from other parents the best ways she could provide long-distance support for Shiri.

Nira Rittenberg was also born in Israel, but she's lived in Canada since she was five. Her son, Oren, 21, is planning to serve in the IDF. "It was something he said he'd do since Grade 9," she said.

"People told us, 'Don't worry, it's something that will blow over. He'll find a degree, a girl, everything will dissuade him from going.' That it won't happen."

Oren, who attended the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and Bialik Hebrew Day School, defied prognosticators. "He believes ideologically that this is something important to do. He believes supporting the state by outsiders is a message [for Israelis] also, and he truly believes it will make him a better person," Rittenberg said.

Former lone soldier Shira Forman addresses a parent support group.

While all his friends from the University of Western Ontario went off on job interviews, he hooked up with Garin Tzabar, the Israeli scout organization that assists foreign soldiers in Israel. He'll fly to Israel in August as part of a group of 30 enlistees – four men and 26 women.

"He wants to be a combat medic," his mom said.

The members of Garin Tzabar, a group formed for Diaspora Jews and children of Israelis who serve in the IDF, are adopted by the Israel Scouts and placed in a hosting kibbutz that becomes their home away from home during their army service. The soldiers experience their army service together as a social unit and provide mutual support and camaraderie, the organization's website states (www.israelscouts.org).

If organizers in Toronto get their way, pretty soon their parents will have their own group providing mutual support and camaraderie, too.

Parents shmooze at meeting to establish support group.

UJA Federation

New fund aims to make education affordable

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — School leaders and parents have enthusiastically welcomed a new Federation CJA fund that aims to make Jewish education more affordable, especially for the middle-class, by capping tuition for eligible families.

"It's a win-win situation," said Sidney Benudiz, executive director of United Talmud Torahs/Herzliah High School, who is pleased by both the extra money's practical effect and the signal the federation is sending that Jewish day school education is a priority.

A pilot program called C.A.P.S., started last year, is now being made permanent and placed under the federation's new Generations Fund for Educational Excellence. It sets a tuition cap for qualifying families, with the fund making up the difference to the school.

Parents can go to www.generationsfund.ca and input their financial and family details into an online calculator to determine whether they qualify under new, more flexible criteria.

Grants of $1,800 are also available for students entering kindergarten and Secondary I as incentives to parents. That part of the program is accepting applications until March 25 at noon.

The Generations Fund, established with donations from some prominent community members, will provide subsidies over and above those already granted to more than 3,000 students through the federation's Tuition Assistance Allocation, which benefits mainly lower income families.

That program's criteria had left more and more middle-income families unable to qualify, the federation said.

The federation has not said how big the Generations Fund is or how much it will pay out each year.

The founders of the fund, along with the federation, are the Sylvan Adams Family Foundation, Morris and Rosalind Goodman Family Foundation, Alvin Segal Family Foundation, in memory of Barbara Weldon, and the Jewish Community Foundation of Montreal.

Participating schools are Akiva School, Solomon Schechter Academy, Jewish People's and Peretz Schools/Bialik High School, Hebrew Foundation School, Hebrew Academy, and Ecole Maimonide.

The Generations Fund will also assist the schools in improving their educational standards.

The Bronfman Jewish Experience Centre will oversee grants to participating mainstream schools for projects aimed at developing lay and professional leadership, fundraising, recruitment, and marketing and public relations, as well as for "cutting-edge" programs that will attract enrolment.

"An excellent Jewish education is vital to preserving culture and Jewish vibrancy in our community," said federation president David Cape. "I'm proud of the measures we're taking to make such an education more accessible, and hope that all those who qualify give this opportunity due consideration."

For more information, visit the program's website, or call Natana Shek Dor at 514-345-2645, ext. 3200.

The Generations Fund is under the Gen J initiative, which aims to preserve and strengthen Montreal Jews' identity, primarily among youth.

As a pilot program for this school year, Benudiz said 72 students out of a total enrolment of approximately 600 at UTT/Herzliah benefited from the new tuition cap.

And with the criteria for eligibility more flexible for next year, he expects even more to be accepted.

The cap on tuition, once approved, he noted, is good for the duration of a child's schooling, from elementary through high school and does not have to be renewed annually.

Sabrina Bercovitch, a Gen J associate at the federation, clarified, however, that the cap would change if the family's income or number of children changes.

Abortion is often permitted: rabbi

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Chabad and Agudath Israel in the United States have "allied themselves" over the years with the Catholic League and Christian evangelicals by supporting the overturning of the U.S. Supreme Court's landmark "Roe v. Wade" decision protecting therapeutic and partial-birth abortions, Congregation Beth-El's Rabbi Allan Nadler asserted recently.

Rabbi Allan Nadler

But although a 1999 Agudath Israel policy paper backs up Rabbi Nadler, Chabad in New York said that it has never tabled a formal public position on Roe v. Wade, and Chabad representatives suggested that Rabbi Nadler is misstating the group's position.

Speaking earlier this month in the first lecture in a four-part series at the shul on the "Jewish Ethical Perspectives on 'Matters of Life and Death'" Rabbi Nadler said the positions of Agudath Israel and Chabad on therapeutic and partial-birth abortions run counter to talmudic law.

In an email exchange with The CJN, Rabbi Nadler said that "there is no basis in Halachah for opposing such medical procedures, since until the baby's head has... exited the womb, the mother's health is paramount, and Jewish law actually mandates that the fetus be destroyed to protect the health of the mother."

He added: "The rabbinic rulings on this are, in my view, perfectly consistent with current U.S. and Canadian law, under which all therapeutic abortions are protected by law. Indeed, a 'partial-birth abortion' is a medical procedure rarely employed, and when it is, it is always to protect the life of the mother," he said.

"Thus my claim is that the position taken by Chabad and Agudath Israel are inconsistent with talmudic law."

But in an email exchange with The CJN, Chabad in New York said that Rabbi Nadler's claims about Chabad have no basis in fact.

"I'm not saying he made it up," media relations director Rabbi Motti Seligson said. "He may have heard something from someone and is defining it as Chabad's position. But I have no idea what he is talking about."

But Rabbi Nadler said that the late Lubavitcher Rebbe, Menachem Schneerson, spoke out against Roe v. Wade "on very numerous occasions... his position is well known."

"Really? So it was a very well-known secret position?" retorted Rabbi Seligson. "If this were an opinion of the Rebbe, whether communicated to 'close associates' or spoken about by farbrengen, it would have been published. I did some of my own research and found no such thing."

Rabbi Berel Bell, founding dean of Montreal Chabad's Chaya Mushka Seminary for girls, did not specifically recall whether Rabbi Schneerson ever offered a specific opinion on Roe v. Wade. He said it's possible that he did, but that he'd have to do more research on it.

Rabbi Nadler said: "One thing is certain: numerous haredi and chassidic rabbis have taken a hard line against Roe v. Wade and even harder against partial-birth abortions."

In general, Rabbi Nadler noted that Judaism allows abortion under many circumstances, because it does not consider the fetus to be human until the mother gives birth.

Those circumstances could include the physical and psychological health and well-being of the mother, he added. The fetus in Judaism is viewed a "limb" of the mother, and not as a human life.

However, he added, Judaism does not allow abortion for frivolous reasons, such as sex selection or for convenience.

Rabbi Nadler said an "enormous amount of confusion exists within the [Jewish] public square" about how Judaism views birth control, abortion and such questions as when human life begins."

One of the major misconceptions, he said, is that there is a "Jewish-Christian ethic" about abortion.

Nothing could be further from the truth, he said.

"The Jewish approach is legalistic, not metaphysical," and not based, as it is in Catholicism, for example, on belief in the "ensoulment" of the embryo from the moment of conception.

Rabbi Nadler cited several sources to make his case.

Exodus 21:22-23 says that if someone causes a woman to abort or have a miscarriage, the person responsible pays a fine and is not considered guilty of ending a human life.

"In legal terms, this would be considered a tort, not a capital offence," Rabbi Nadler said

In the Mishnah (Ohalot 7:9), if the life of a woman in labour is in jeopardy, one can dismember the fetus (a partial-birth abortion) as long as the head has not yet emerged, at which point the fetus is considered human.

The "most powerful" source for Rabbi Nadler is Arachin 7a, which says that even in the case of a pregnant woman condemned to death, her execution would not be postponed until the baby is born, unless she is in labour.

In other words, it's clear you're not killing two people if you execute a pregnant woman, Rabbi Nadler said, even though it might very well appear "unseemly" to do so.

Developers sue posters' author for defamation

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Gordon Warren says he's not an antisemite and that he's just trying to raise awareness of alleged corruption at Winnipeg City Hall.

The man behind the notorious "$hitler's List" posters also claims that he didn't realize most of the names on that list were Jewish until after he began posting his posters in downtown Winnipeg last fall. He further claims he was shocked at the response.

But while Manitoba's attorney general and Winnipeg police have declined to press charges against the failed city council candidate, brothers Robert and Sandy Shindleman have sued him for defamation and are asking for an injunction stopping him from making further accusations on his blog, as well as for general, punitive and special damages and that he pay their court costs.

The brothers' statement of claim says the "untrue and defamatory statements of the defendant were made deliberately, with malicious intent, and were motivated by racism and antisemitism," and that they "constitute hate speech," the Winnipeg Free Press reported.

The Shindleman brothers are among western Canada's leading property developers and commercial realtors. They're also longtime friends and business associates of Winnipeg Mayor Sam Katz.

In January, Warren acknowledged that he produced the posters. The attorney general's office declined to bring charges because they didn't explicitly promote genocide, a B'nai Brith Canada attorney told the National Post.

The Shindlemans' suit primarily accuses Warren of libel, but it also claims the brothers were the victims of hate speech. If the hate speech claim is proven, the court could issue an injunction stopping Warren from saying anything more about the brothers.

Sandy & Robert Shindleman

Warren has noted in his blog postings that Shindico, the brothers' company, has won several untendered city hall contracts during Katz's tenure (he is in his third term), including a land swap between Shindico and the Winnipeg Fire Department that came to light last summer and had not been approved beforehand by city council.

He also referred in his postings to Katz's purchase of a home in Scottsdale, Ariz., from Sandy Shindleman's sister-in-law. Katz reportedly paid $1 million for the property.

But the brothers claim Warren did more than publicly allege they've been involved in irregularities. They say he has accused them of shady transactions in their dealings with city hall and the transaction in Arizona.

They also say Warren contacted Revenue Canada, U.S. tax authorities and the Phoenix FBI office about the Arizona deal, alleging that the Shindlemans were involved in "bribery, fraud and money laundering." In a Feb. 20 blog post, Warren said the FBI and the IRS are investigating the deal.

Warren may claim he's not on an antisemite, but his blog (bringkatztojustice.blogspot.ca) suggests otherwise. In a Feb. 23 post, under the heading, "the Katz Doctrine," he listed what he suggested are Katz's "Ten Commandments":

"1) God is never angry about the Jews, just about the Non-Jews. 2) Who wants to be smart shall occupy himself with money matters, because there are no corner pillars in the Torah that are more important, because they are like a sparkling fountain. 3) The possessions of the goyim are like an ownerless desert, and everybody (every Jew) who seizes it, has acquired it. 4) Non-Jewish property belongs to the Jew who uses it first.

"5) The Jew is allowed to practice usury (loansharking) on the non-Jew. 6) Jews may steal from non-Jews. 7) Jews always have to try to deceive non-Jews. 8) Jews may lie to non-Jews. Jews may use lies (subterfuges) to circumvent a gentile. 9) Every Jew is allowed to use lies and perjury to bring a Non-Jew to ruin. 10) If a Jew is tempted to do evil, he should go to a city where he is not known and do the evil there."

The case will be heard in the Court of Queen's Bench starting March 26.

Woody Allen's classic film, "Manhattan" will kick start this series - Thursday, April 11, 1PM

Thursday, April 18, 1:30PM
"Heart of the City" by Ariel Sabar
New York is one of the world's most romantic cities, so it's no surprise that Ariel Sabar chose it as the magical setting for his short stories, each of which is dedicated to the true story romance of 9 individual couples. These relationships span the 1940's to the present day.

Thursday, May 2, 1:30 PM
"The Golems of Gotham" by Thane Rosenbaum
This is an affectionate, humorous, but serious love story with a difference. Fourteen-year old Ariel seeks to understand the missing people in her life – her grandparents and mother. Using the mystical Jewish symbol of redemption and rescue (golem), Ariel hits the streets of New York with six literary Holocaust-surviving ghosts, who teach her how to live and love.

Thursday, May 30, 1:30 PM
"Rules of Civility" by Amore Towles
In 1938, young, feisty and single Katey Kantent navigates life in New York, moving from her secretarial job with a law firm to the upper reaches of New York society. This love story visits many of New York's sites, while bringing in hints of the music of the times (jazz), the art (Stuart Davis), fused with echoes of F. Scott Fitzgerald and other contemporary literary figures.

The Hittites: a forgotten people rediscovered

The Hittites were a people who, although mentioned in the Bible, were virtually unknown until the late 19th and early 20th century.

Early in the 20th century, German archeologists came upon an imposing site called Boghazkoy, on central Turkey's Anatolian plateau, in the bend of the Halys River. It has been continuously excavated ever since, with minor interruptions during the two world wars.

We now know that the major phases of Hittite power occurred in the second millennium BCE during the Middle and Late Bronze Ages, and were divided into the Old and New Hittite Kingdoms. The Old Hittite Kingdom flourished in the first half of the second millennium, while the New Kingdom was a major power in the Near East from 1420 until 1200 BCE during the Late Bronze Age.

We first hear of the Hittites from documents found in the Old Assyrian trading colony of Kanesh, modern Kultepe, in southeastern Turkey, circa 1750 BCE. They quickly rose to become a major power in the region, and one of their kings, Mursilis I, sacked Babylon in a lightning raid, either in 1590 or 1550 BCE (depending on which chronology one uses), bringing to an end the city's first dynasty, made famous by the well-known Hammurabi. There seems to be evidence that Mursilis himself was murdered upon his return home. It was an act that plunged the Hittite kingdom into almost two centuries of chaos.

It was during the next phase of their history, New Kingdom, that the Hittites would become major players in the history of the Ancient Near East. This was the period that the renowned American Egyptologist, James Henry Breasted, called the First International Age. It's represented by the large cache of tablets found at the court and capital of the heretic Pharaoh Amenhotep IV, better known as Akhenaten. These documents are known as the Amarna tablets, named after the modern Egyptian site, Tell el Amarna, where they were discovered.

Past Forward

Alex Gropper

One of the Hittite princes almost became pharaoh of Egypt when the widow of the famous Tutankhamun (Akhenaten's successor), Ankhesenamun, asked the Hittite king to send her one of his sons to marry. However, there seems to be evidence that he was murdered on his way to Egypt.

The Hittites would have a chance for revenge at the Battle of Kadesh, circa 1274 BCE, when they fought Ramses II. It's the only ancient battle for which we have two accounts, both the Egyptian and the Hittite. Each side claimed a victory, but it would seem that the Hittites did better since Egypt virtually withdrew from Syria after the battle.

Afterward, both sides drew up a peace treaty, of which we also have two copies. It would be one of the last bouts of glory for the two empires, as they were about to be engulfed by the mass migrations and population displacements at the end of the Bronze Age, circa 1200-1150 BCE. It was these upheavals that would bring Israel to the former Egyptian province of Canaan.

Passover cleaning, Part 2

Cleaning and cooking and so many dishes/ Out with the chametz, no pasta, no knishes/ Fish that's gefilted, horseradish that stings/ These are a few of our Passover things. [http://bit.ly/passclean8]

If Passover cleaning isn't one of your favourite things, you're not alone. But as the days count down to Passover, take a break. Commiserate with coreligionists. And meet some who actually look forward to the annual ordeal.

Debra Nussbaum Cohen is not in that camp. It's the cleaning competitiveness that gets to her. As when her friends kvetch, "'Oh, Sammy brought chametz into the living room after I turned it upside down to clean it for Pesach (sigh)," or "I told Maddie to stay out of the closet. I already cleaned but she got in there (sigh)." Nussbaum says it's time for women to unshackle themselves from "Brillo bondage." [http://bit.ly/passclean16]

Elana Sztokman is a sister in arms. "I think we women should stop trying to seek approval, be it from other women, from our mothers, from our neighbours, or from men… I would rather spend some imperfect time with imperfect friends and family making imperfect art and music at an imperfectly set table, where we can share our flaws and our real strengths, and laugh and smile our way through this wonderful holiday." [http://bit.ly/passclean17]

The late Jerusalem Post humorist Sam Orbaum set his sights on the annual cleaning ritual – and his wife's rush to chuck out the non-kosher for Passover food, including a jar of date spread. "Whoa there. That's the one commandment I do observe religiously: thou shalt not throw away perfectly good food. We have an understanding in my home: the kids get first dibs.

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

What they leave over, we offer the cat, what the cat doesn't want is my supper. So that's why, the other night, we all sat down to a delicious meal of honeyed date-spread patties with marshmallow topping (left over from Lag b'Omer) on a bed of lemon wafers (Purim). When I asked the kids what they'd like for dessert, they begged for broccoli." [http://bit.ly/passclean18]

In "The Joys (?) of Passover Cleaning," Emuna Braverman utters some very controversial words: "I'm beginning to feel like an endangered species, because I like Passover. It's actually my favourite holiday." This fact dawned on her after she attended one of those Passover getaways where everything is done for you. "And I learned an important lesson. Studying the ideas underlying Passover was not the true preparation… It was the physical effort that led to the emotional and intellectual preparation. I felt less prepared when I didn't take out my special dishes, when I didn't clean my children's bedrooms… And I felt more alone. That crucial link to other Jewish women was not being forged… So, much as I would like a vacation, as tempting as some events sound, I've returned to what I enjoy. I can't wait to start cleaning." [http://bit.ly/passclean9]

When the plagues strike/ When the lice bite/ When we're feeling sad/ We simply remember our Passover things/ And then we don't feel so bad.

Have a Chag Kasher v'Samayach – a kosher and happy holiday.

On Pesach, I'm stickin' with the union

Rabbi Jennifer Gorman

Pesach is a holiday of many meanings. It's a holiday of freedom. It's the holiday on which b'nei Ya'akov became Am Yisrael. It's the holiday most deeply embedded in the Jewish psyche, but it's also a day of strong family and personal meaning. "V'haya ki yomru aleichem b'neichem ma ha'avodah hazot lachem (Shmot 12:26). "And it shall happen that your children shall say to you, 'What is this service to you?'"

I hail from socialist, Zionist stock. I was raised on the music of the labour movement in English, Yiddish and Hebrew. Holidays were a connection to generations of freedom fighters, to the union leaders of my grandparents' and parents' generation, and to those generations of Jews willing to stand up to oppression from the time of Mitzrayim until today.

Pesach was the greatest of all. We sang slave spirituals and labour songs. We recited a poem called The Greatest Walkout Ever Known. These ideals were thoroughly embedded by the time my own children were born. They learned Woody Guthrie lyrics alongside the Shema. We smiled every time our eldest sang out "You can't scare me. I'm stickin' with the union!" Over time our children's taste in music moved on from Woody Guthrie's Songs to Grow By to Alice Cooper. The Beatles are a huge favourite, and our eldest has discovered classical music.

Rabbinic Reflections

Still, Pesach is the time we return to our roots. We are again singing the spirituals of "When Israel was in Egypt land, let my people go..." and "For the old man is a comin' for to carry you to freedom, follow the drinking gourd." We do this because God took us out of Egypt, saying to us that we shall follow the mitzvot, especially those regarding the treatment of others, because we were once slaves in Egypt. This is the meaning of this service to us. We understand. We're not afraid to stand up to tyranny and injustice, and we're sticking with the union that binds us as a community and a nation throughout history and into the future.

There is an old Jewish joke, "They tried to kill us. We won. Let's eat." Throughout all of history, Jews have not only fought against oppression and hatred, we have celebrated our victories. It's not the victory over others, but the victory over hatred, injustice and oppression.

We celebrate because we know it could have been different. We know because we live it. We live it as a collective memory, we live it through history, and we live it each and every day.

Expanding the discourse

As Pesach approaches, it's easy to get caught up with all the preparations, the invitations and the menu. It's easy to forget that this holiday is a celebration of so many things that year after year we could choose our focus. One year we may decide to centre our seder conversations around freedom, another year it might be redemption, and yet another year it might be human suffering. The goal of the seder, and the holiday in its entirety, is to experience the challenges of ancient Israel and realize that these remain challenges to the human condition even in our modern world.

Pesach is filled with politics, from the personal to the national. On the personal political level, we all experience the question of who will be going to which seder. Who will be hosting and how much time will we spend on the ritual before getting to the food. There are family members who enjoy the philosophical/religious discussions, and there are family members who roll their eyes and count the pages of the Haggadah. We are all seated around the same table.

The national politics usually address questions of whether the message of Pesach is particular to the Jewish People or a global message. Should we put an orange on the seder plate to remember gay, lesbian and other fringe groups who do not yet feel welcomed? Should we introduce the idea of Miriam's Cup, or should we remain strictly traditional? All of these questions are wonderful fodder for seder discussions, something the sages promoted.

Midrashic Moments

Rachael Turkienicz

Pesach is a time for broadening our view of Jewish possibilities. It's an opportunity to expand our discourse and hear ideas we would otherwise not get the chance to explore. Whether or not one is ready to embrace a new practice is irrelevant. The important aspect of Pesach is to seize the moment for discussion – to let our minds truly experience the freedom of a free-thinking person and explore new thoughts.

Even if nothing changes around our seder tables, we can choose innovation in our approaches. The great Torah commentator Maharal stated that the four cups of wine at the seder table are representative of the four matriarchs. He has introduced the idea that we are framing our seder with the strength of our ancestral women. We could follow this theme and decide to discuss the strong women of our particular families. We can honour the memories of those who have passed away as well as recognize and celebrate the women present in our lives. We could discuss each woman as we prepare to drink each of the four cups of wine.

We would truly be enacting the goal of the sages, since the midrash stated that Israel was redeemed from Egypt due to the merit of our righteous women – the women of the ancient world, in our four cups and the women of today, in our enriched conversations around the seder table. It's a tremendous way to experience the celebration of this great holiday.

Quebecers' books about Jews are bestsellers

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Two very different books with strong Jewish themes by francophone Quebecers are bestsellers in Montreal this month.

Pourquoi moi? Ma vie chez les Juifs hassidiques (Les Editions Libre Expression) by Lise Ravary and Anita, une fille numérotée (Les Edition XYZ) by Claude Jasmin were No. 14 and No. 22, respectively, on the bookstore Renaud-Bray's list of most popular books last week.

The former is veteran journalist Ravary's memoir of her powerful attraction to Judaism – unusual for someone who describes herself as a Québécoise de souche from Hochelaga-Maisonneuve. She was editor-in-chief of Chatelaine and Elle Québec, and founding editor of Elle Canada magazines.

Disillusioned since her teens with the Catholic faith she was raised in, Ravary began her journey toward conversion to Judaism following a trip to Israel some 20 years ago.

Jasmin's lightly fictionalized short novel is a story of star-crossed love set after World War II. The narrator (clearly Jasmin) falls madly in love with a Jewish girl, a Holocaust survivor. There is no happy ending. In fact, the story concludes under a cloud that has hung over Jasmin for the rest of his life. Jasmin has never before told his real life love for such a girl and how it abruptly ended, and the book has a confessional tone.

Israel Truth Week fights 'obvious lies'

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Fighting anti-Israel "radicalism" isn't just for Jews – everybody must support Jewish students on campus, says Mark Vandermaas, a civil rights activist and founder of Israel Truth Week, which has been holding events in several Canadian cities this month.

"We're sending a message to Jewish students and their families that they're not alone," Vandermaas said.

He uses the term "week" loosely when referring to his campaign, which is in its second year.

A two-day conference took place in Hamilton, Ont., on March 5 and 6 featuring 21 speakers whom Vandermaas described as "local knowledge experts," including human rights advocate Majed El Shafie, who helps rescue people who are persecuted based on their faith.

In the week after the conference, March 11 to 15, the right-leaning Canadian Patriotic Society (CPS) held daily two-hour vigils at York University. There was also a student-run event at Ryerson University organized by the Ryerson Israeli Student Association and Ryerson Campus Conservatives.

The week of vigils at York came one week after Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) took place on the school's main campus.

CPS member Sharon Isac said IAW inspired her to become involved in Israel Truth Week.

"Even as an ordinary... citizen, not of Jewish descent or of any religious faith, I take great offence in being lied to and feel shame in seeing the obvious lies and delegitimization of a sovereign state that has existed for more than 60 years," said Isac, who is Japanese-Canadian.

Mark Vandermaas speaking at the Israel Truth Week conference (David Strutt photos)

Israel Truth Week conference keynote speaker Majed El Shafie

Although Vandermaas' family is not Jewish, his father escaped from a Nazi war camp during the German occupation of Holland, he said.

His interest in pro-Israel activism grew out of his criticism of how police handled protests that erupted in Caledonia, Ont., in 2006, when aboriginals demonstrated for nearly a year against a construction site they said was on native land. He says anti-Israel groups were supporting what he described as the protesters' "lawlessness" there.

The final straw, he said, was when he heard about an event celebrating Israeli culture at the University of Western Ontario that was shut down by anti-Israel protesters. He decided something needed to be done.

Vandermaas said this year's Israel Truth Week was "light years ahead" of the inaugural version. Only 50 people attended last year's one-day conference, though he noted that it was put together with very short notice. This year, however, about 200 people attended over two days.

But Vandermaas said he's not concerned about numbers. He considers the campaign a success, because it has attracted enough people that it could take on a life of its own even if he were no longer involved. As well, he said, it has helped him make several valuable connections, such as Rabbi Jonathan Hausman in Boston, who ran a panel discussion there this year.

Additionally, conference organizers raised about $14,000 for Alyn Hospital, a pediatric and adolescent rehab facility in Jerusalem.

He said he hopes Israel Truth Week will continue to grow.

"The thing to remember is that Israeli Apartheid Week is about attacking values. Israel is a proxy for all of the traditional liberal values that we in the West hold dear," he said. "We have to defend those values whether those victims are in Israel or here."

Isac agreed, saying the CPS considers it a matter of upholding democratic values and principles.

"Unless we are prepared to take a stand and defend them vigorously, with our lives if necessary, we are in danger of losing them," she said.

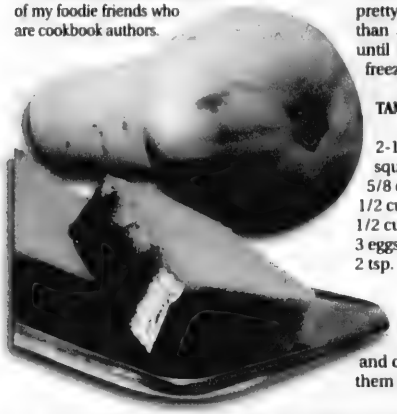
Passover Food Ideas

A magical matzah tour – dining with the authors

Norene Gilletz
Special to The CJN

All aboard the magical matzah! We're going on a culinary tour to see what's cooking in the kitchens of several of my foodie friends who are cookbook authors.



First stop is in Jerusalem at the home of cookbook author and food writer, Tamar Ansh. She is the author of Pesach – Anything's Possible: Over 350 Non-Gebrochts, Gluten-Free & Wheat-Free recipes. Tamar writes: "Here's a great kugel recipe that is neat, pretty and a totally different colour and taste than all other kugels you've probably met until now! Plus it's baked, not fried in oil, freezes well and presents so beautifully."

TAMAR ANSH'S BUTTERNUT SQUASH KUGEL

2-1/2 cups cooked and mashed butternut squash (about 2 medium squashes)
5/8 cup potato starch
1/2 cup oil
1/2 cup sugar
3 eggs
2 tsp. cinnamon

Cut the butternut squash in half lengthwise. Place the pieces in a large pot with about 2 inches of water, and cover the pot. Bring to a boil and cook them for 30 minutes, until the squash is fork tender. Remove the squash from the pot and let it cool. Scoop out the meat from the skin, discarding the skins. Mash the squash meat and measure out the amount needed.

Tip: Any extra squash can easily be frozen and used later in a vegetable soup.

Preheat the oven to 350. Sift the potato starch over the mashed squash with a small sifter or tea strainer. (This prevents lumps.) Add in the oil, sugar and eggs. Mix together, by hand, very well until the batter is smooth.

Line an 8 x 11-in. baking pan or two medium-sized loaf pans with baking paper or spray them with baking spray. Pour the batter into the pan(s). Sprinkle the cinnamon over the top of the kugel. Bake for 40–45 minutes, until the centre of the kugel tests firm when pierced with a knife. The centre of the kugel, even when firm, should still be a bit moist. Be careful not to overbake the kugel. When it is done, it also cracks slightly on top. Serves approximately 8.

Tip: This kugel slices neatest when it is cold. Make it one day in advance. The next day, slice it into neat squares and then it can be served cold or warmed up again, covered, for 10 minutes before serving.

It's time to get back on board the magical matzah for our next stop – so welcome to my Toronto kitchen. I can hear you asking: "Another kugel recipe?" They say if you're having three guests for dinner, six kugels should be enough! I've made various versions of this farfel vegetable kugel for family and friends over the years and it's always a hit. The basic concept came from my late mom's recipe for her farfel kigelach, which she made in muffin tins. I've updated it, adding lots of vegetables to make it healthier than the original version.

NORENE'S FARFEL AND BROCCOLI KUGEL

Recipes with a healthy twist

2 medium onions, chopped
1 red or yellow bell pepper, seeded and chopped
2 cups sliced mushrooms
2 cloves garlic (2 tsp. minced)
1/2 cup chopped fresh parsley (or 1 tbsp. dried)
1 1/2 tsp. salt (or to taste)
1/2 tsp. black pepper
5 eggs
paprika for garnish

Preheat oven to 375. Spray a 9x13-in. baking dish with cooking spray.

In a large bowl, combine matzah farfel with broth. Let stand for 10 minutes or until the liquid has been absorbed.

Meanwhile, in a 4-cup glass measuring cup or bowl, microwave broccoli covered on high for 4 minutes, until tender-crisp. Let stand covered for 1 minute. Cool and add to farfel.

Heat oil in a large skillet on medium heat. Add onions, bell peppers, mushrooms and garlic. Sauté until tender, about 10 minutes. Cool slightly.

Add cooked vegetables, parsley, salt and pepper and eggs to farfel/broccoli mixture and mix well.

Spread mixture evenly in prepared baking dish and sprinkle with paprika.

Bake uncovered for 45 to 55 minutes. When done, kugel will be golden and crusty. Yield: 12 or more servings.

Note: Keeps up to 3 days in the refrigerator. Freezes and reheats well.

Variations:

Instead of broccoli, substitute cauliflower florets.

For an elegant twist, use a mixture of mushrooms (e.g., cremini, shiitake, portobello).

Mini Farfel Kugels: Fill sprayed muffin pans three-quarters full. Bake at 375 about 25 to 30 minutes, until golden.

The next stop is in Long Island, N.Y., at the home of cookbook author and registered dietitian Bonnie R. Giller. Bonnie is the author of Passover the Healthy Way: Light, Tasty and Easy Recipes Your Whole Family Will Enjoy, which contains more than 100 taste-tested traditional kosher recipes with a healthy twist. For information, visit www.passoverthehealthyway.com.

Bonnie and I became virtual friends via Facebook, where she offers expert nutrition advice to her many fans and clients. I was delighted when she agreed to share one of her healthy and delicious Passover recipes with me for this article.

BONNIE GILLER'S CHICKEN WITH HONEY WINE SAUCE

2 whole chickens, cut into quarters (about 3 lb. each)
1/2 tsp. pepper
1 cup dry red wine
3 garlic cloves, crushed
1 tsp. dried thyme
1 tsp. dried basil
1 tsp. dried sage (omit if not available)
1/4 cup honey

Preheat oven to 400. Place chicken in a large, deep roasting pan. Sprinkle with pepper. Combine remaining ingredients, stirring to dissolve honey.

Pour over chicken. Roast, basting frequently, until chicken is tender and browned, about 1-1/4 to 1-1/2 hours. Serves 8.

Israeli chefs prepare feast

Anna Harwood
Special to The CJN

Pesach need not be a time to compromise in the kitchen. It is still possible to serve a sumptuous feast while being careful not to include chametz. As Israel's top hotels are gearing up for one of their busiest periods, executive chefs Moti Bochbut and Charlie Fadida from the Inbal Jerusalem and Sheraton Tel Aviv respectively, took time out to share a few of their most popular Pesach recipes.

SEARED SALMON FILLET ON A BED OF ROASTED EGGPLANT WITH PEPPERS AND TOMATOES

Chef Moti Bochbut, executive chef Inbal Jerusalem Hotel

4 salmon fillets (with skin attached)
4 cloves of crushed garlic
3 tbsp. olive oil (plus extra for frying) bunch of fresh thyme, chopped juice of 3 oranges
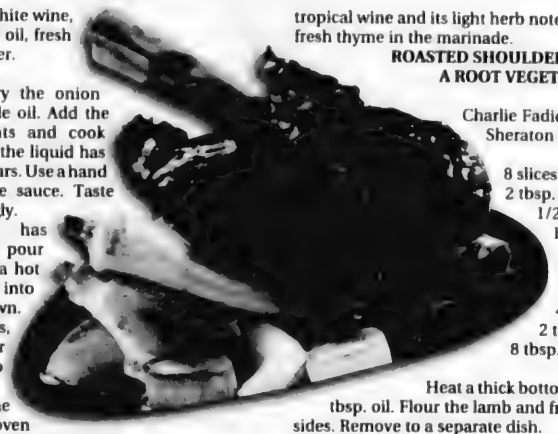
1 cup white wine (Sauvignon Blanc recommended)
salt, pepper
1 eggplant, peeled and cut into 3 cm.-thick rounds
2 tbsp. olive oil
¼ cup vinegar
2 tbsp. honey
radish sprouts or roasted pepper to decorate

Tomato sauce:
4 fresh tomatoes, chopped
1 medium onion, finely chopped
1 red pepper, coarsely chopped
2 cloves of fresh garlic
3 tbsp. white wine
1/2 cup vegetable stock
salt, pepper,

Soak the salmon fillets for around an hour in a marinade of the orange juice, white wine, garlic, 3 tbsp. of olive oil, fresh thyme, salt and pepper.



Make the sauce: Fry the onion and garlic with a little oil. Add the remaining ingredients and cook over a low heat until the liquid has absorbed all the flavours. Use a hand blender to blend the sauce. Taste and season accordingly.

When the fish has finished marinating, pour a little olive oil into a hot pan and place the fish into the pan, skin side down. Cook for two minutes, flip and cook the other side for a further two minutes.

Place the fish to the side and preheat the oven to 180. Heat the fish for a further 4 minutes in the oven when ready to serve.

Fry the eggplant in a hot pan with a little olive oil on both sides until it turns a golden brown.

In a small pan, boil the vinegar and honey and then pour over the fried eggplant so that it can absorb the flavours.

To serve:

Place a slice of the roasted eggplant on each plate. Carefully place a fillet of salmon on top of each eggplant round and then decorate with radish sprouts or even a slice of roasted pepper.

Drizzle tomato sauce to the side of the fish and serve hot. Serves: 4

Wine Recommendation: This dish goes perfectly with the Mount Hermon White which is available in all good kosher wine stores. The Mount Hermon White is a deliciously tropical wine and its light herb notes will complement the fresh thyme in the marinade.

ROASTED SHOULDER OF LAMB IN A ROOT VEGETABLE SAUCE

Charlie Fadida, Executive Chef, the Sheraton Hotel, Tel Aviv

8 slices of lamb shoulder
2 tbsp. potato flour
1/2 bottle of dry red wine
1 carrot
1 onion
1 root vegetable
1 stick of celery
4 garlic cloves
2 tbsp. tomato paste
8 tbsp. olive oil

Heat a thick bottomed pan and add the 8 tbsp. oil. Flour the lamb and fry until golden on both sides. Remove to a separate dish.

Add the tomato paste to the pan and continue frying for another 5 minutes. Add the red wine and heat until the wine has decreased by half.

Return the meat to the pot and add water until the meat is ¾ of the way covered. Bring to the boil and season with salt and pepper.

Cover with aluminum foil and place in an oven, pre-heated to 350. After 2 hours cooking time, take the meat out and check that it has softened by pressing with finger. If so, remove from oven and serve.

Wine Recommendation: Lamb is a delicious, tender meat which needs to be matched carefully with a fitting wine. The Yarden 2T is up to the challenge with its intriguing mix of cherry, plum and floral notes layered with characters of spice, chocolate and French oak. It is a full bodied and flavour-rich wine which complements rather than overpowers this equally flavorsome dish.

Is quinoa kosher for Passover?

Chavie Lieber
JTA

NEW YORK — On any given day, a wind might blow through the farmlands of South America, pick up an errant grain of barley and deposit it nearby among the vast rows of cultivated quinoa. If that barley manages to make its way into a sifted batch of quinoa, and avoid detection during repackaging, it could wind up gracing your seder table on Passover night.

However dubious it might seem, the scenario is among the reasons that the world's largest kosher certification agency is refusing to sanction quinoa for Passover consumption, potentially depriving Jewish consumers of a high-fibre, protein-rich staple that many have come to rely on during the weeklong holiday.

The Orthodox Union (OU) announced last year that it would not certify quinoa as kosher for Passover out of concern that quinoa falls into the category of kitniyot, a group of legumes forbidden because they look similar to grains proscribed on the holiday.

Rabbi Menachem Genack, CEO of OU Kosher, also cited the danger of quinoa crops grown in close proximity to wheat and barley fields.

Star-K, a rival kosher certification company based in Baltimore, has been certifying quinoa as Passover-friendly for years and dismisses what it sees as an outlandish prohibition.

Long a staple of the Andean diet, quinoa has earned a reputation as "the mother of all grains," celebrated for its high nutrient quality and as an alternative for those following a gluten-free diet. But quinoa is not a grain at all. It's a member of the goosefoot family, and closely related to spinach and beets.

On Passover – when wheat, oats, rye, spelt and barley are all prohibited – quinoa has emerged as a popular substitute.

That could change, however, with the world's major kosher certifier refusing to give quinoa its Passover seal of approval.

"We can't certify quinoa because it looks like a grain and people might get confused," Rabbi Genack said. "It's a disputed food, so we can't hold an opinion, and we don't certify it. Those who rely on the OU for a kashrut just won't have quinoa on Passover."

The OU's non-endorsement is the result of a debate within the organization's own ranks.

The OU is recommending that kosher consumers look to their local rabbis for guidance on the quinoa question.

Seder in Poland signifies rebirth of Jewish community

Beverly Levitt
Special to The CJN

Seven years ago, California entrepreneur Severyn Ashkenazy gathered in Warsaw, Poland with a small group of American and Polish Jews – all of whom had fled their native land during the Holocaust – and hosted the first Passover seder in that city since 1945.

That Passover actualized a rebirth of the Jewish community to Poland.

But Ashkenazy, whose brainchild the Warsaw celebration was, had a formidable time pulling it together. In fact, it was several years in the making.

Although there were 450 thriving synagogues and some three million Jews in the country before World War II, when the vibrant 66-year-old survivor went back to Poland in 1994, for the first time since he was a child, he found only a handful of haredi Jews.

Ashkenazy thought that if there was a supportive, progressive Jewish community in Warsaw, these "quiet Jews" could reclaim their identity and make peace with their past. And so Beit Warshawa – congregation of Warsaw – was born.

Ashkenazy's first order of business: to host a Passover seder. "It wasn't easy convincing anybody to attend," says Ashkenazy, comfortably seated in his art-filled home in Beverly Hills, Calif. "But we are a people who are constantly saved by miracles, so our group persevered."

"The first seder, which was held in a hotel, in a room near the garden," he relays, had just 20 people – eight Jews and a smattering of Poles. "We were just happy to have anybody participate," he says.

"We ate delicious dishes I remember my mother making – kugels, tsimmes, gefilte fish, chicken soup with knaidlech, brisket, macaroons, and compotes – beloved Passover recipes that had their origins in Poland. They were so comforting; it reminded me of a more innocent time," he says.

Now, the community has its first full-time rabbi , Burt Schuman, from Altoona, PA, and the congregation boasts more than 1,500 people.

ROAST CHICKEN

From The Jewish Holiday Kitchen by Joan Nathan, Schocken Books, 1988.

2 - 3 1/2 lb. chicken, quartered
salt to taste
pepper to taste
seasoning salt to taste
paprika to taste
2 large cloves garlic, peeled and crushed
2 dozen pearl onions, left whole with skin intact
2 dozen small white potatoes, left whole with skin intact
1/2 cup water
1/2 cup white Passover wine
vegetable oil as needed

Preheat oven to 350. Season chicken with salt, pepper, seasoning salt, paprika and garlic. Lay chicken, skin side up, in a roasting pan. Douse onions and potatoes with oil and seasonings; place in pan with chicken. Roast 20 minutes. Add a little water if pan becomes dry. Turn chicken over and roast 20 minutes more. Add wine to pan drippings and baste chicken periodically. Turn chicken over once more and roast 20 minutes with skin side up. If you like skin crisp, place chicken under broiler before serving. Serves 6 to 8.

MATZAH STUFFING

From The Jewish Holiday Kitchen by Joan Nathan, Schocken Books, 1988.

We recommend this dish be cooked outside the bird.

2 matzahs, broken into small pieces
1 large onion, grated, then drained
2 stalks celery, finely diced
4 mushrooms, quartered
2 tbsp. chicken fat or pareve margarine
3 tbsp. matzah meal
1 tbsp. chopped parsley
kosher salt and pepper to taste
paprika to taste

Preheat oven to 350. Soak matzah in hot water for 10 minutes, being careful not to let it get soggy. Drain thoroughly and squeeze excess liquid. Combine onion, celery, mushrooms with matzah. Sauté mixture in chicken fat or margarine, until golden. Add matzah meal, parsley, salt, pepper, paprika. Place in greased baking dish. If desired, dot with chicken fat or margarine. Bake for 20 minutes or until golden and slightly crisp on top. Makes 4 cups.

APPLE AND CARROT TSIMMES

From Jewish Cooking in America by Joan Nathan, Alfred A. Knopf, 1998.

Tsimmes is not only a beloved Ashkenazi side dish, in Yiddish the word means a "complicated procedure," "a mix-up," an "affair blown out of all proportion."

The word also translates as "trouble." A Jewish husband might have said to his wife or business associate, "Don't make such a tsimmes out of it."

While Jews in Lithuania used sweet potatoes and meat in their tsimmes, in Poland the main ingredient was carrots, accompanied, at the whim of the mama, by prunes, raisins, or apples.

6 carrots, peeled and sliced in 1/4 in. rounds
1/4 to 1/2 cup hot water
3 tart apples (Granny Smith) peeled, cored and sliced into thick wedges
3/4 cup brown or white onions, peeled, sliced, then sautéed until golden
1/2 cup raisins
1/4 cup brown sugar or honey, or to taste
salt to taste
1/8 tsp. white pepper
1 cup orange juice
2 tbsp.potato starch
1 to 2 tbsp. pareve margarine

Preheat oven to 350. Place carrots in a saucepan; add water and cook, about 5 to 8 minutes, until tender. Add apples for last 5 minutes of cooking time. Drain and turn carrots, apples and onions into a lightly greased 2 1/2-quart casserole. Add raisins, sugar or honey, salt and pepper. In a small bowl mix orange juice and potato starch until smooth. Pour over carrot-apple mixture. Dot with margarine and bake for 30 minutes or until the top is golden brown. Serves 8.

Kicking up the matzah balls

Eileen Goltz
Special to The CJN

For close to 40 years my friend and I have carried on a debate as to which is the ultimate matzah ball. I contend that my mother's sinkers are best. He touts his lighter, fluffier floaters.

Flavour and texture can be built in several ways. For texture the most common method is by using plenty of stiffly beaten egg whites, which adds fluffiness. You can roll the balls to make them slightly compact.

In my opinion adding water or seltzer to a recipe doesn't really contribute anything substantial taste or texture wise.

The following recipes are all family and friend tested and run the gamut from classic to really way out there. The truth is there is only one truth when it comes to matzo balls, floater, sinker, baked, boiled or stuffed, they're all delicious when shared with family and friends.

HERBED MATZAH BALLS

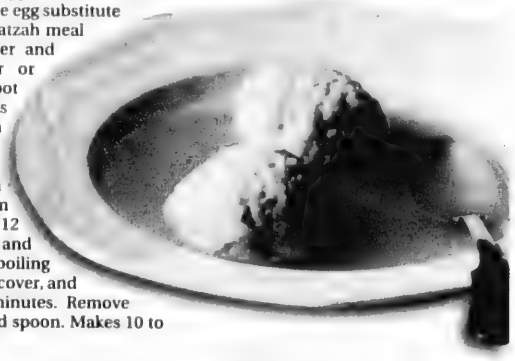
4 large eggs, beaten
6 tbsp. seltzer or club soda
1/4 cup vegetable oil
1 cup matzah meal
salt and pepper to taste
2 tbsp. finely chopped fresh parsley
2 tbsp. finely chopped fresh dill
1 tsp. ground ginger

In a bowl combine the four eggs, seltzer, oil, salt and pepper. Stir in the matzo meal and herbs. Cover and refrigerate the mixture 2 hours. With wet hands, shape matzo balls into 2 1/2 inch balls. Boil 4 quarts of water or broth and add the matzo balls to boiling hot soup or water. Cover and simmer the matzo balls for about 15 minutes (don't peek). Makes 14 to 16 matzo balls

LOW CHOLESTEROL MATZAH BALLS

1 cup matzah meal
salt
1/4 tsp. black pepper
4 egg whites
1/4 cup low-fat chicken broth
1 tbsp. finely chopped parsley, optional

Place matzah meal in medium bowl with 1 tsp. salt and pepper. In another bowl combine the egg substitute, broth and parsley. Pour the egg substitute mixture over the matzah meal and mix well. Cover and refrigerate 1 hour or longer. Fill large pot with 4 to 5 quarts of water. Season to taste with salt, then bring to boil. Moisten hands with cold water. Form dough into 10 to 12 medium size balls and drop them into the boiling water. Reduce heat, cover, and simmer. 20 to 30 minutes. Remove carefully with slotted spoon. Makes 10 to 12 matzah balls.



STUFFED AND BAKED MATZAH BALLS

vegetable oil for greasing muffin pans
4 large eggs, slightly beaten
2 tbsp. oil
1 cup matzah meal
2 tsp.salt
2 tbsp. chopped parsley
6 tbsp. chicken soup or water

Filling:
1 onion, chopped extra fine
2 tbsp. oil
2 tbsp. matzah meal
1 egg yolk
salt and freshly ground pepper dash of cinnamon water oil
12 cups chicken soup

Grease cups of a 12-cup muffin pan and set aside. In a medium bowl, beat eggs and oil together. Stir in the matzah meal, salt and parsley. Add the chicken soup or water. Refrigerate 1 hour or more, to absorb the liquid. Meanwhile, make the filling. Fry onion in oil or chicken fat over medium heat until it is very crisp. Cool slightly and then mix in 2 tbsp. matzah meal and egg yolk. Season to taste with salt, pepper and cinnamon.

Dip palms of your hands in cold water. Form 12 matzah balls from the refrigerated mixture, wetting your hands as needed to keep them from sticking. Spoon a heaping teaspoon of filling into the middle of the matzah ball and close well. Fill a 6-quart pot with a lid with salted water and bring to a boil. Reduce to a simmer and drop in the matzah balls.

Cover pot and cook just at a simmer for 30 minutes or until plump. Remove matzah balls with a slotted spoon and put them in the greased muffin tins. Coat each matzah ball with a little oil and bake in preheated 350-degree oven for about 30 minutes, or until golden brown. To serve, place one matzah ball in the centre of a soup bowl and spoon chicken soup over. Makes 12 matzah balls or 6 servings.

JULIE'S BUBBIE'S MATZAH BALLS

4 eggs
1/2 cup club soda
3 tbsp. vegetable oil
2 tbsp. finely chopped parsley
salt
2 tsp. dried parsley
freshly ground black pepper
1 cup matzah meal

In a bowl whisk the eggs until just blended. Add the club soda, vegetable oil, salt and pepper. Go easy on the salt. Blend in the parsley and matzo meal. Cover and refrigerate this mixture for about 1 hour.

Bring about 5 quarts of water to boil. Rub vegetable oil on hands and form matzo balls with about two tablespoons of mixture. Drop in boiling water and simmer covered and don't [illegible] (okay, maybe once or twice) for about 2[illegible] 35 minutes.

Israel has a new government

The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu drove the short distance from his residence to the president's residence Saturday night to formally confirm to President Shimon Peres that he has managed to muster a majority coalition.

Peres charged him with that task on Feb. 2 in the wake of the Jan. 22 elections, and gave him a two-week extension four weeks later, making Saturday the final day of Netanyahu's maximum six-week allocation.

"I've fulfilled the mission with which you entrusted me," Netanyahu told Peres.

Netanyahu said the coming year would be "a critical year" marked by challenges in the security sphere and the economic sphere, and by efforts to make peace. "I believe we can bring good news for all Israel's citizens in all these fields," he said. "That's my task, and I know it's your prayer."

Peres said he knew how hard it had been to muster a majority, and congratulated Netanyahu on managing the task. Peres said that along with the challenges facing Israel, "there are lots of opportunities in the areas of security, social action and peacemaking." This is the time to seize them for the good of the country and its people, he added.

Representatives of the Canadian Jewish community sent their congratulations to Israelis as well, in statements issued on March 15.

David Koschitzky, chair of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, said his organization offers its "support to all those in the Knesset who have chosen the path of public service.

"We are confident that the incoming government – which reflects a broad spectrum of the Israeli public – will work to advance policy solutions that unite the country and improve the quality of life for all Israelis."

'Showed solidarity with the Jewish community'

"He has celebrated Jewish holidays in synagogue and supervised a Kristallnacht commemoration in his cathedral in Buenos Aires. It seems clear there is a strong mutual understanding and friendship on which both the Catholic and Jewish communities can continue to build."

Rabbi David Rosen, director of interfaith affairs for the American Jewish Committee, told JTA that the new pope is a "warm and sweet and modest man" known in Buenos Aires for doing his own cooking and personally answering his phone.

After the bombing of the AMIA Jewish community centre in 1994, he "showed solidarity with the Jewish community," Rosen said.

In 2005, he was the first public personality to sign a petition for justice in the AMIA bombing case. He also was one of the signatories on a document called "85 victims, 85 signatures," as part of the bombing's 11th anniversary. In June 2010, he visited the rebuilt AMIA building to talk with Jewish leaders.

"Those who said Benedict was the last pope who would be a pope that lived through the Shoah, or that said there would not be another pope who had a personal connection to the Jewish People, they were wrong," Rosen said.

Soon after the chimney of the Sistine Chapel sent up a puff of white smoke signifying that the cardinals had selected a successor to Pope Benedict XVI, Francis addressed thousands of faithful from the balcony of St. Peter's Baslica.

"Buonasera," he told them, saying "good evening" in Italian, and thanked his fellow cardinals for going "almost to the ends of the earth" to find him.

Benedict was the first pontiff to step down since 1415.

Israel Singer, the former head of the World Jewish Congress, said he spent time working with Pope Francis when the two were distributing aid to the poor in Buenos Aires in the early 2000s, part of a joint Jewish-Catholic program called Tzedaka.

"We went out to the barrios where Jews and Catholics were suffering together," Singer told JTA. "If everyone sat in chairs with handles, he would sit in the one without. He was always looking to be more modest. He's going to find it hard to wear all these uniforms."

Pope Francis also wrote the foreword of a book by Rabbi Sergio Bergman, a Buenos Aires legislator, and referred to him as "one of my teachers."

Last November, as a cardinal, Pope Francis hosted a Kristallnacht memorial event at the Buenos Aires Metropolitan Cathedral with Rabbi Alejandro Avruj from the NCI-Emanuel World Masorti congregation.

He has also worked with the Latin American Jewish Congress and held meetings with Jewish youth who participate in its New Generations program.

"The Latin American Jewish Congress has had a close relationship with Jorge Bergoglio for several years," Claudio Epelman, executive director of the Latin American Jewish Congress, told JTA. "We know his values and strengths. We have no doubt he will do a great job leading the Catholic Church."

In his visit to the Buenos Aires synagogue, according to the Catholic Zenit news agency, the then-archbishop Bergoglio told the congregation that he was there to examine his heart "like a pilgrim, together with you, my elder brothers.

"Today, here in this synagogue, we are made newly aware of the fact that we are a people on a journey and we place ourselves in God's presence," Zenit quoted archbishop Bergoglio as saying.

"We must look at Him and let Him look at us, to examine our heart in His presence and to ask ourselves if we are walking blamelessly."

Renzo Gattegna, president of the Union of Italian Jewish Communities, offered Italian Jewry's congratulations to the new Pope with the "most fervent wishes" that his pontificate could bring "peace and brotherhood to all humanity."

In particular, Gattegna voiced the hope that there would be a continuation "with reciprocal satisfaction" of "the intense course of dialogue that the Jews have always hoped for and that has been also realized through the work of the popes who have led the church in the recent past."

'We will act to improve the quality of life'

Frank Dimant, CEO of B'nai Brith Canada, said the new government was formed at "a critical moment in Israel's history" when the country's enemies are gathering strength.

"The prime minister of Israel and his new cabinet face enormous challenges in their search for true partners for peace. We want them to know that, in Canada, we recognize the enormity of these challenges and support all their efforts to find a realistic and lasting solution."

Netanyahu was able to report on his success after the Jewish Home and Yesh Atid parties finally signed a coalition agreement with Likud-Beiteinu Friday afternoon, paving the way for the new government to be sworn in on Monday.

Earlier on Saturday, Netanyahu also formally informed the Knesset's acting speaker, Binyamin Ben-Eliezer, that the work of building a new coalition was complete.

Yair Lapid, the Yesh Atid leader, will be the minister of finance; Likud's Moshe Ya'alon will be minister of defence; the Foreign Ministry portfolio is being held vacant for Yisrael Beiteinu chief Avigdor Liberman. Likud's Zeev Elkin, who will be deputy foreign minister, said Saturday he had not been confirmed in the post, but anticipated that this would take place on Sunday.

Labor leader Shelly Yachimovich said

Naftali Bennett, the leader of Habayit Hayehudi (The Jewish Home) spoke to the media on Monday at the Knesset after the new government was sworn in.
[Flash90 photo]

Friday she looks forward to leading a robust opposition, and had no regrets about rejecting Netanyahu's repeated invitations to join the coalition.

"The new government will work together in full co-operation for the benefit of the entire Israeli public. We will act to strengthen the state of Israel's security and to improve the quality of life of its citizens," said Netanyahu in a statement Friday.

"We promised during elections to take care of the cost of living, to increase competition in the marketplace and to restore to the state its Jewish soul, and now we've got the tools to do it," Jewish Home head Naftali Bennett told reporters.

"With God's help, we signed it. The 33rd government is ready to go!" he wrote on his Facebook account. "I encourage Prime Minister Netanyahu and all of us cabinet ministers to remember that we are representatives of the entire Israeli public."

Tzipi Livni's Hatnua party signed up with the coalition last month, but Netanyahu then faced weeks of difficult talks with Jewish Home and Yesh Atid over coalition terms. Livni will lead peace efforts with the Palestinians, under Netanyahu's supervision. However, any territorial withdrawal, the coalition agreements reportedly state, will require a national referendum.

The two parties insisted on a smaller government – 22 ministers – and on commitments for radical reform to bring haredi men into military service and the workforce, for a "core curriculum" to be taught in haredi schools, and for electoral reform, among other issues. Their demands were anathema to the two haredi parties, Shas and United Torah Judaism, which will now be part of the 52-member Knesset opposition led by the Labor party.

Bennett will head the cabinet panel on concentration of wealth and market competition, and his party will head a joint Knesset committee tasked with drafting a new universal military conscription law.

The coalition comprises four parties: Likud-Beytenu (31 seats), Yesh Atid (19), Jewish Home (12) and Hatnua (6), for a total of 68 members in the 120-seat Knesset.

The outgoing government held its final meeting on Sunday. The new government was sworn in on Monday, some 48 hours before the scheduled arrival of U.S. President Barack Obama on his first official visit.

Karsenty awaits verdict in latest al-Dura 'hoax' case

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Philippe Karsenty admits to being a little pessimistic.

A month ago, he appeared before the Paris Appeals Court in a case that arose out of the Muhammad al-Dura shooting hoax. The case has dragged on for years, and most recently he's had to again show how the French national broadcaster, France 2 TV, misled its viewers by wrongly claiming Israeli soldiers shot and killed the 12-year-old al-Dura at the Netzirim junction on the second day of the Palestinian intifadah in 2000.

Karsenty is upset because he feels the French establishment is arrayed against him, protecting one of its golden boys, France 2's Israel bureau chief, Charles Enderlin. "The whole French establishment is against the truth and against Israel," he said.

Karsenty also feels he hasn't received the kind of support he deserves from the government of Israel, which he says hasn't asserted its innocence in the case with nearly enough vigour.

"The State of Israel, by not defending itself, is putting the Jews around the world in a bad situation," Karsenty said.

He points to the way antisemites have fastened on the al-Dura incident to accuse Jews of a blood libel. Al-Dura became the poster boy for the intifadah. Postage stamps with his likeness were issued in the Arab world, and an al-Dura poster was clearly visible when Islamist terrorists murdered U.S. journalist Daniel Pearl.

"Al-Dura has a son and his name is Toulouse. As long as our enemy can say they are slaughtering our kids in revenge for theirs who were deliberately killed, too, we have a serious problem," Karsenty said. He was referring to the radical Islamist killer, Mohammed Merah, who in 2012 murdered a rabbi and three children at a Jewish day school in Toulouse.

Merah was inspired by the phony al-Dura allegations, Karsenty asserted.

Today, Karsenty awaits a verdict in his case, which will be delivered April 3. No matter how it goes, he feels he's in a lose-lose situation.

If the court rules against him, agreeing with a trial court that he libelled Enderlin by calling his report a hoax, he clearly loses.

But even if he wins, his opponents will argue it was only on a technicality.

"If I win, they'll find a way to discredit me in the media," he said.

Karsenty set off the seven-year legal imbroglio when he publicly, and loudly proclaimed that the French TV report on the al-Dura incident was a complete fabrication. He was sued and lost at trial, but he appealed.

During the appeal, the judges ordered Enderlin to make all the raw footage recorded by France 2's cameraman, Talal Abu Rahma, a self-professed supporter of the Palestinian cause, available to the court. Enderlin wasn't on the scene when the incident took place and relied on Abu Rahma for the content of his report.

The footage showed lengthy periods in which dozens, if not hundreds of Palestinians milled about at a time the report claimed they were being fired upon by Israelis. The footage does not support claims al-Dura was shot. In fact, it shows him moving after he supposedly was already dead.

As well, there were no obvious signs of blood, the bullet holes did not line up as they should have if Israelis were firing at him, and the footage showed Palestinians faking injuries, with ambulances arriving seconds afterward, suggesting made-for-TV news fabrications, later dubbed "Pallywood."

Karsenty won on appeal, but the Supreme Court ordered a new hearing, saying the lower court erred in compelling Enderlin to produce the footage. As the appellant, Karsenty was responsible for presenting evidence.

Despite the odds stacked against him, Karsenty does not regret putting so much of his energy into publicizing the "blood libel." But, "next time, I'd recommend doing so only if Israel is ready to fight."

Meanwhile, in France the establishment has rallied around Enderlin. Former president Nicolas Sarkozy presented Enderlin with France's Legion of Honour – after the case had gone to trial.

For Karsenty, that's just another indication that "French society is not ready to face the truth."

"In France, the media has decided that Israel is the monster, and they've decided to protect their anti-Israel propaganda. We need to face that. There's no political will to destroy the hoax."

Three more suspects arrested for Toulouse attacks

JTA

PARIS — Three men suspected of planning a terror attack inspired by Toulouse killer Mohamed Merah were arrested.

The suspects, who were not named, were arrested last week in Marignane and Saint-Cyr-sur-Mer near Marseille, Francois Molins of the Paris Prosecutor's Office said Monday at a news conference. Molins said they were in possession of weapons and a cache of explosives.

"The group was capable of committing a terrorist bomb attack on French soil within a short time frame, probably within a few days," he said.

Surveillance of their activities showed the men were "radical jihadists glorifying Mohamed Merah," Molins said, referring to the 23-year-old Islamist who killed three children and a rabbi at a Jewish school in Toulouse last year. Days earlier, Merah killed three French soldiers in two attacks.

In related news last week, police destroyed a fake explosive device found near a Jewish institution in the French city of Lyon.

A store owner told police that while walking past the city's Hillel Centre, he found a contraption made of three metal cylinders connected with metal wires to what looked like a cellular phone, according to a report on the incident by the SPCJ security unit of France's Jewish communities.

Police evacuated residents from nearby buildings before destroying the object, which according to the 20minutes.fr news website was not a bomb.

"Whoever placed this did everything they could to make us believe this was a bomb," a city official said.

PA duped Norway

The Palestinian Authority misled Oslo when it said Norwegian aid money wasn't used to reward murderers of Israelis, Norway's foreign minister, Espen Barth Eide, said. "It is unfortunate that the incorrect information obtained from the Palestinian Authority was communicated to the Parliament," Eide said. Anders Anundsen, a lawmaker for the Progress Party, said the government has long claimed Norwegian aid did not go to Palestinians incarcerated in Israeli jails for murders and terrorist activities. The PA has pledged monthly payments to Palestinian prisoners in Israel since 2003 and raised payments by as much as 300 per cent in 2011, according to Israel's Channel 2 TV network. Eide's statement came after his ministry received new information that revealed a "major difference to what we have assumed, according to earlier information we received from the PA," Eide said. Norwegian aid to the PA came under scrutiny in Norway last month after a documentary aired by the NRK public broadcaster showed aid went to inciting hate against Israel. Norway, one of the Palestinians' strongest supporters in Europe, has contributed more than $50 million a year to the PA since 2008.

Schalit speaks out for Pollard

Freed Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit joined the call on U.S. President Barack Obama to release spy-for-Israel Jonathan Pollard. Schalit signed an online petition asking Obama to commute Pollard's life sentence to time served. "I have signed a petition and call on you to do the same. Freedom is a great gift and privilege," Schalit posted on his Facebook status. "I thank those who worked for my release, and now I ask you to join the struggle to save Pollard." More than 150,000 Israelis have signed the petition. The petition, which appears in Hebrew and English, was placed online Feb. 11 and will be hand delivered to Obama during his visit to Israel later this month, according to the Justice for Jonathan Pollard organization.

Crash kills two

An Israeli military helicopter crashed during a routine training flight, killing two crew members. Lt.-Col. Noam Ron, 49, of Oranit, and Maj. Erez Flekser, 31, of Haifa, both veteran military reservists, were killed when their Bell AH-1 Cobra crashed March 12 in southern Israel as it was travelling to Palmachim Air Base.

Mexican resort and spa live up to top ratings

A little piece of paradise lies in the heart of Mexico's Riviera Nayarit at the Grand Velas Spa, at the AAA Five Diamond Grand Velas Riviera Nayarit. The all-suites resort has garnered numerous accolades, including from Forbes magazine, which declared it one of the 10 coolest all-inclusive resorts.

Kathryn Kates
Spa File

Just 15 minutes north of Puerto Vallarta on Banderas Bay, the ultra-luxurious spa, a member of the Leading Spas of the World, was named by SpaFinder Wellness as one of the 30 Hot Spas in North America, and with your first step through the spa's grand glass doors, you can understand why.

The warm, elegant spa, whose décor reflects Mexican, indigenous and local Nayarit (state) influences, is celebrating its 10th anniversary. The 16,500-square-foot sanctuary houses 20 treatment rooms, a gym and exercise room, a beauty salon and a spa boutique retailing lines such as Natura Bisse, as well as organic Mexican products. A focal point of the spa is the spacious hydrotherapy circuit that echoes relaxation from its flowing waters. An hour before any treatment, a valet guides each guest through the stations of the hydrotherapy area.

There are 52 staff members at the spa, including receptionists, valets, fitness instructors and 22 therapists who minister to clients seven days a week from 8 a.m. to 8 p.m. Silvia Velasco, manager of the Grand Velas Spa, says that 40 per cent of the spa guests are men.

The Grand Velas Spa offers 60 European treatments and Asian-inspired therapies to energize the body and restore one's spirit. "After the hydrotherapy circuit, and once in the cabine, our treatments all begin with our spa welcome ritual," says Velasco. "We present a tray representing the four elements of nature and a paper butterfly, because butterflies represent the transformation received from your spa treatment.

"We are very proud because people make great comments, and I think it is because we give a special touch for everyone so that they feel like the only person that we attended to that day. When people leave, the expression on their faces says everything."

Velasco says the spa's most popular services are sports and holistic massages, as well as the therapeutic massage. "This massage is a combination of techniques, including reflexology and shiatsu."

A treatment not to be missed is the Four-Hand Samunprai Massage. It's a perfect way to release tension and muscular pain with the help of hot compressions containing exotic herbs, aromatherapy and two therapists working "hands-in-hands" for 80 blissful minutes.

Other pampering treatments offered include the 100-minute Magnetic Diamond Treatment and Diamond Experience Facial, named in honour of the spa's AAA Five Diamond rating; the Silk Magic Body Wrap; the Reflexo-thermal Mud Treatment, and just so fitting for this oceanfront resort, the Exotic Seashell Massage.

Romantic massages are offered on the beach of Banderas Bay or in the privacy of your suite. There are children's menus with 10 different services, including a Bubble or Princess Massage that can be enjoyed along with family members, also on the beach or en suite, as the spa caters to those 16 years and up, only.

Eight packages are presented as Spa Rituals, including the Green Spa Ritual with Avocado Seed Scrum, Seaweed Bath Therapy, Banana Leaves Body Wrap and Organic White Tea Facial, or the Diamond Ritual with a Crystalized Honey Scrub, Milk Bath Therapy, Neuro Aroma Massage and an Oxygenating Facial.

Grand Velas Riviera Nayarit features 267 large, modern ocean-view suites. It's a family-friendly resort with first-class service, from the top-notch restaurants to the tiered three-temperature infinity pools. There's also a tennis court, plenty of meeting space and a Kids Club. Close at hand are championship golf courses. There are a number of tours and activities offered by nearby outfits, including the Whale Photographic Safari from Vallarta Adventures.

If shops, art galleries and nightlife appeal to you, the Riviera Nayarit has it all, including the market in the fishing village of Bucerias, where souvenir shopping can be had at great bargains for those who know how to haggle; the bohemian art colony of Sayulita with its upscale shops and galleries or, to the south, the bustling city of Puerto Vallarta.

Boutique owner is 'in love with fashion'

Vicky Tobianah
Special to the CJN

Every day looks different for Meira Elituv. The 27-year-old boutique owner might spend one day on the phone with Australian designers, another day in her clothing store in Toronto or sometimes she might be hiring models and overseeing photo shoots.

"You're not gonna work nine to five," she laughs. "You're gonna work nine till you faint."

But there's nothing she would change. "I can't explain why I'm so in love with fashion, but I am and always have been," she said. "Literally, since I was 11 years old flipping through fashion magazines, I've just loved it."

Elituv grew up in Toronto, where she attended the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), Richmond Hill campus. After graduation she spent a year in Israel, then was accepted to fashion school in Los Angeles. She earned two degrees: one in fashion design and another in business administration. It was definitely a route that most of her CHAT peers had not taken.

"Looking back and seeing the directions my peers have gone into, I've seen there is sort of an expectation for a lot of people, a mould that graduating CHAT sets out for you," she said. "I didn't feel like there was any mould for me, and even if unconsciously I felt there was, I didn't let it stop me."

That confident attitude is something she took with her to Los Angeles, knowing that believing in yourself was key to succeeding in a competitive city like L.A. "You have to be comfortable doing what you're doing and not worry about the little failures," she said.

She immediately fell in love with the city – a perfect place for an aspiring fashion designer. "There's just such an energy about it, you kind of embrace it and it embraces you," she said.

The great weather was just a bonus. "I moved back [to Toronto] last year, and I'm so grateful that California has sun all the time. I'm missing it," she said. "Especially in fashion, I can't wear my suede heels out in the winter when it's icy."

Knowing how competitive the fashion industry can be, Elituv decided to condense all her classes into just a day and a half, during her last year of school, so she could also work full-time as a brand representative presenting to some of the city's biggest buyers.

"I didn't get a lot of sleep, and I can't remember how I did it because now when I don't get sleep, I'm just such a mess," she said. "But it was actually very smart of the school – they want you to work really hard when you're 19 or 20, so when you're 23 you can get a full-time job and you're ahead of the curve." The plan worked: upon graduation, she got a job at a private label company – and most of her colleagues were in their late 20s, making comparable salaries.

If you want to get into the fashion industry, it's definitely not easy and requires a lot of hard work, she said. You have to be prepared for long hours and learning how to work with diverse people all over the world. "It's a bicoastal industry – you're constantly talking to people everywhere, all over the world," said Elituv. "There were times I had to stay at the office till 10 p.m. at night because I was waiting for a call from Hong Kong."

But if you love fashion, then it will be worth it, she believes. "You can't do it if you don't love it," she said. "It's all I ever wanted to do."

She spent three years working in Los Angeles for different fashion companies before Limited Brands, the parent company to well-known brands such as Victoria's Secret and Bath & Body Works, recruited her. She moved to Ohio to become a merchant for them, where she spent a year and a half being completely involved in the design process – from buying to marketing the product to placing it in stores and tracking sales. "You get to have your hands in everything in such a detailed way," she said.

It was that experience that eventually led her to opening her own business. She decided to return home to Toronto, not knowing what type of career she would find here. But when a friend hired her to attend trade shows in the States, she was surprised to find out that many of them did not sell to any stores in Canada.

"It was an amazing opportunity for Canadian consumers who want to buy these kinds of designs," she said. "Where are the Canadian stores? Does the Canadian store not want to buy this stuff?"

The market was open to bring in specialty American and Australian designers to Canadian stores. In September 2012, along with her sister, Tamara, she opened Cloakroom, a fashion boutique, hoping to bring unique pieces to the Canadian consumer, at comparable prices to what it would cost in the United States. "No one was willing to take the risk," she said. "Our store was."

Just six months into the business, they're already debt-free. Elituv said running their own store has taught her and her sister a lot about how to succeed in the fashion world. Her top three tips?

"Never give up," she said. "You may have a lot of setback and failures, but don't give up – you need to push hard and go further and faster."

Second, she said you must keep an open mind. You may end up dreaming of becoming a designer and then find yourself in fashion marketing. These new experiences will only take you to places you'd never thought you could go.

Finally, she said you have to learn not to judge your own success based on the success of others.

"You shouldn't emulate someone else's career, you should carve your own path and be successful yourself," she said. "It's worth it."

Alon Nashman stars in witty contemporary comedy

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Veteran Toronto stage actor Alon Nashman is starring in This, a comedy by New York-based Canadian playwright Melissa James Gibson, currently running at Toronto's Berkeley Street Theatre.

Directed by Canadian Stage Company's artistic and general director, Matthew Jocelyn, This features Laura Condlin, Christian Laurin, Yanna McIntosh and Jonathon Young, an ensemble cast that Nashman calls an inspiring, A-list monster team.

"The play is a beautifully crafted Rubik's cube of relationships," says Nashman, who plays Alan.

> 'The play is a beautifully crafted Rubik's cube'

"College friends who have stayed together for years have been rocked by the loss of one of their members, the husband of Jane, the central character who everyone adores," Nashman says.

"In the course of her coming out of grieving, she is set up with a mysterious Frenchman who is a doctor without borders. This man throws all of their lives into a flurry, with all sorts of passions and jealousies coming to the fore."

Nashman says the play is a piercing observation of contemporary lives and our fascinations and it takes an extremely funny look at the way 30-somethings and 40-somethings are trying to find meaning in their lives.

Nashman's character is a gay friend of this group, who has a remarkable talent. "He can remember everything he has ever heard. He's a professional who actually goes on TV and makes his money remembering a lecture from college or remembering a conversation from awhile ago, and then they test him because they have a recording of the actual thing," Nashman says.

"That's his odd skill, and it comes into a personal and practical use when this finely honed group of friends start to break apart and remember arguments and conversations and he is able to correct everyone. He's a person you would never want around because he is incapable of forgetting."

Nashman says he's had the privilege of playing incredibly intelligent people before, including Einstein, Freud and Kafka. And once again he's playing a kind of Jewish genius. "What I love about him [the character] and what I can identify immensely with is his struggle to do the right thing and to bring some balance of significance to his life."

Alon Nashman

Nashman says that along with wit, there is a great deal of "heart" and "philosophy" in the script. "There is a kind of effervescence to the dialogue. Melissa James Gibson has laid out a phenomenal scavenger hunt for the audience – deeper and deeper into these characters. I think audiences will be delighted as well as provoked."

Nashman says the set design of This is so startling that audiences are going to walk into a space they think they know as the Berkeley Street Theatre and they are going to be upended by the way This uses it.

Nashman's long list of theatre credits includes Picasso at the Lapin Agile, Forests, Scorched Democracy, The Wild Duck, Macbeth, Remnants and most recently Hirsch at the Stratford Festival. Hirsch received a rave review from the New York Times. His film and TV credits include Jonestown: Paradise Lost, Cinderella Man, Our Fathers, The Pact and The Assistant.

This year, Nashman will be taking his one-man play, Kafka and Son, which he and Mark Dassidy created 10 years ago for the Ashkenaz Festival and has since toured across Canada, Iceland and Scotland, to Europe with a stop in Prague, Kafka's birthplace.

The play This runs until April 13. For tickets, call 416-368-3110 or visit www.canadianstage.com.

Stories that will leave the reader breathless

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

Once, as a young teenager, I had an uncanny, almost otherworldly experience that seemed to free me momentarily from the confines of my familiar world. I'd had an emotional scene at home (the details are forgotten) and needed an escape. I walked briskly into the backyard of our Bathurst Manor home and impulsively did something I had never done before – climb the triangular antenna mast that rose beside the house.

When I reached the roof, I took a few steps up the slope toward the peak, then stopped in astonishment as an unanticipated vista of bungalows – neat rows of them, street after street – suddenly hove into view. Spread out before me was a vigorous universe of parallel lives, all in close proximity. The sight took me out of myself and left me breathless.

I've found similar feelings described in wonderful stories such as Truman Capote's The Tree of Night, John Cheever's The Enormous Radio, and Steve Stern's Zelik Rifkin and the Tree of Dreams, a piece in Stern's recently published The Book of Mischief: New & Selected Stories. (Graywolf Press)

The protagonist of Zelik Rifkin and the Tree of Dreams is the teenaged Jewish nebbish of the title, who lives in the Jewish neighbourhood of Memphis, Tenn., known as "the Pinch," where he is bullied by his peers and ridiculed by Minnie Alabaster, the girl he adores. One stiflingly hot summer, residents of the Pinch escape their oppressive homes and camp overnight in a local park, and Zelik climbs into the branches of a leafy tree, partly to escape the mocking catcalls of his gang.

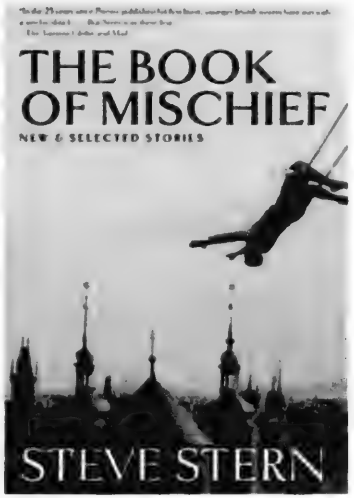
Climbing as high as he can, he encounters a sort of foggy cobweb and sticks his head through – and then discovers he can see into the lives of all his neighbours, many of whom are lying on blankets in the park below. Somehow all of their dreams have risen to a common level and congealed "at a height where some dauntless climber, provided he had the means of ascent, could reach them."

Each night over that sizzling summer, the local Jews take to sleeping outdoors, and the lowly Zelik giddily climbs the tree, puts his head through "the spiral ceiling of fog," and starts to feel as if he's floating over the neighbourhood just like the old Jew who floats over the shtetl in a Chagall painting. He sees the hidden worlds of most of the locals such as Lipman the cobbler, Max Taubenblatt the haberdasher, Aharon Notowitz the Hebrew teacher, and Mr. Silver, his boss at the grocery store who is enamoured with Zelik's mother.

Best of all, Zelik's nocturnal excursions seem to transform him in everybody else's eyes. Suddenly everyone is "giving him such a red carpet treatment, after years of either ignoring him or making fun," and even Minnie sees him as a hero. But as the weather changes and people begin sleeping at home again, their treatment of Zelik reverts to its former chill. Preferring the mystical world of dreams, the nebbish climbs up into the tree and pulls himself entirely into the fog, free at last from the confines of the world. As the story ends, his corporeal body falls from the tree with a "desolate shriek."

Stern typically writes about comically low characters leading drab, ordinary lives, who descend or ascend – it's not clear which – into a fabulous and other-worldly realm. He is a thoroughly Jewish writer with characters fully steeped in millennia of Jewish mysticism and lore, their deeds informed by centuries of Jewish mishegas and tradition. How, for example, do folks in the Pinch adapt to the record heat? "Wearing ice bags in place of their yarmulkes they gathered in panting quorums to say prayers invoking rain."

Not surprising for a longtime resident of Memphis who once compiled an oral history of its colourful



Jewish section, Stern has written numerous stories set in the Pinch. Others take place on New York's Lower East Side, in Europe and in the Catskills. His acclaimed 2010 novel The Frozen Rabbi combines the shtetl backdrop with modern America.

In the book, a Memphis teenager finds an Old-World rabbi from the shtetl preserved in his family's large freezer; the rabbi thaws out and adds dazzle to their mundane existence. A similar plot device is used to great effect in the story The Tale of a Kite, which features a diminutive and sprightly rabbi who floats upwards through a skylight to the upper realms.

In the story Lazar Malkin Enters Heaven, the title character is an obscenely old man who refuses to die; he is so decrepit that dust flies off him as from shaking a rug. In exasperation, the Malach Ha-mavet, the Angel of Death, pushes Lazar into an "empty burlap pedlar's sack" and carries him off. In a 2008 interview with The Forward, Stern said he realized after writing the story that many legendary Jews were similarly transported to heaven while still alive, from Enoch to the Prophet Elijah (for whom we pour a cup of wine at the Passover seder).

"It was as if I'd plucked a single flower and pulled up an immense root system, tangled in which were several thousand years of wanderings, holy texts and a multitude of ghosts," Stern explained. "Also enmeshed in those roots was a Yiddish literature aswarm with writers like I.L. Peretz, Itzik Manger, S. Ansky and I.B. Singer, writers whose stories ignored the boundaries between the ordinary and the fabulous."

Brimming with energy and allusion, Stern's "whiplash sentences" and sharp comic dialogue convey a Yiddish sensibility that seems reminiscent of Bernard Malamud, but with all of his ghosts and demons and mystical effects, he seems to be a natural successor to Singer in particular.

Stern, however, isn't always master of the perfect ending – his denouments often go on far too long. His Prague-set story, The Man Who Would Be Kafka, for example, brilliantly reproduces the Kafkaesque universe of fear and diminished human possibility as well as a modern Prague where Kafka is celebrated as a literary Elvis.

"The stalls devoted to tourist kitsch displayed Kafka postcards, stationery, coffee mugs; T-shirts bearing his silk-screened likeness hung on racks and the slumped shoulders of youths. A bronze head, fixed to the corner of a building where Kafka was allegedly born, exaggerated his features: the jug ears stretched to satanic points, the soft eyes rendered piercing as a mesmerists's, the forehead receding to a vampirish widow's peak. Look left and you saw a Kafka museum, right and there was the Kafka Bookstore & Cafe. Young men, wearing bowler hats and competing with one another in anemic dissipation, held placards advertising Kafka walking tours."

This is gorgeous, evocative prose; but the story goes much longer than it should and, like several other pieces in this collection, overextends its welcome. This collection might have been more dazzling had its creator taken better heed of the critical dictum, "Less is more."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

A marathon of ascents to holy Jerusalem

David L. Shulman
Special to The CJN

A song of ascents; of David:
Jerusalem is built like a city
That is closely compacted together.
That is where the tribes go up
The tribes of the Lord
To praise the name of the Lord
– Psalm 122

Just as the tribes went up to Jerusalem, so did more than 20,000 runners from 35 countries who participated in the third annual running of the 42-kilometre International Jerusalem Winner Marathon earlier this month.

Runners took part in one of the five races offered: the full marathon that attracted 1,100 participants; the half marathon; the 10-kilometre and 4.2-kilometre races, and an 800-metre "public race."

More than 14 non-profit aid agencies benefited from fundraising efforts linked to the marathon.

Runners started in Gan Sacker near the Knesset and fanned out over the Eternal City; all routes were hilly and challenging. The courses brought runners to the most beautiful parts of the city, including Rehavia, Mamilla and the Armenian and Jewish Quarters of the Old City. In addition, the half-marathon and full-marathon participants toured Armon Hanatziv and were treated to spectacular views of the Mount of Olives and the Old City. Marathoners additionally ran up Mount Scopus and circled the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, where we saw far out onto the Judean Hills and the desert beyond. The marathon is appropriately promoted as a "Run Through History."

I was fortunate to run the March 1 marathon with people of many nationalities, including Belgians, Hungarians, a Danish group and a number of Christian groups.

They attracted no attention from the hundreds of Orthodox Jews running in their kippot, with payot and tzitzits flying in the wind. Orthodox women ran in runners' tights underneath their calf-length dresses. There were so many Orthodox runners that a synagogue tent was set up along the course. Is the "prayer station" due to become a marathon fixture?

The course was hilly enough to slow everyone down, but we also took time out to gaze awestruck at the views of Jerusalem and the surrounding area. I stopped dozens of times on the tops of hills to snap photographs and catch my breath. Needless to say, this was the slowest marathon I have ever run. It's no wonder that Women's Running Magazine in the United Kingdom named this marathon one of the world top 10 long-distance events, but suggested readers try the shorter runs – 10 kilometres or 21 kilometres, a half marathon – to avoid the "steep and potentially punishing climbs."

In addition to being the most challenging marathon I've run in, it was also the most heavily guarded. Israel Defence Forces soldiers were at every corner and, though armed, seemed relaxed. The soldiers yelled out encouragement to the runners as much as any other bystander.

Abraham Kabeto Ketla of Ethiopia finished first in two hours, 16 minutes and 29 seconds, setting a new course record. Mihiret Anamo Antonios, also of Ethiopia, set a record in the women's race with 2:47:26. The relatively slow times for these international-level runners was due to the difficult, hilly course, which was a challenge for runners of all levels.

The 2014 running of the Jerusalem Marathon is set for March 21. I may go up to Jerusalem once again for a marathon of ascents.

Tournament supports Reena

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

More than 300 players recently participated in the third annual Joel Schwartz Memorial Hockey Tournament, which raised more than $150,000 for Joel's Ongoing Inclusion Network (JOIN).

JOIN is an endowment fund that supports inclusion programming at Reena, a non-profit social-service agency that helps people with developmental disabilities. To date, the tournament has raised more than $400,000.

The March 10 event, held at Chesswood Arena in Toronto, was created in honour of Joel Schwartz, a Reena client who passed away in 2009 at the age of 25.

Diagnosed with Asperger syndrome early in his life, Schwartz faced many challenges but persevered with support. Just two months before he died, he participated in a CIE Birthright Israel trip with the help of a Reena volunteer.

Schwartz's brother, Jonathan, founded the annual hockey tournament with friends Zack Belzberg and Jesse Abrams. Jonathan said the endowment fund has "already committed capital to three inclusion-focused programs with the ability to support these programs in perpetuity."

The programs include the Reena Birthright Shadow Program, which covers half the cost of a shadow for each trip; subsidizing community-centre memberships for residents of the new Reena housing complex on the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan, Ont., and funding various inclusion-oriented programs co-ordinated by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Community Connect team.

Jonathan said he knows his brother would be "honoured to have initiated a charity for others like him to grow and develop into mature adults while finding their places in the world."

Belzberg said Joel loved to watch Jonathan's hockey games and would be "so happy" to see everyone united through the sport in his honour.

He said he hopes the evening allowed people to develop "a more informed understanding of Joel, why it's important to preserve his legacy, and how they have contributed to an initiative that is helping so many people just like him."

Through the creation of the endowment, "we now have the ability to connect our players and volunteers to the cause we are supporting. Our players are not only participating for the great hockey, but also to learn about and support those living with developmental disabilities."

Belzberg said the event was such a success because of many generous donations, tournament sponsors, a dedicated committee and 20 participating hockey teams. With the support of our community, the tournament has "experienced incredible growth and will continue to do so in the future."

Dance gala supports brain health

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Baycrest raised $22 million for brain health this year, including $750,000 from its recent gala, Dancing With Our Stars, a charity spinoff of the hit TV show

The March 7 event, held at Toronto's Allstream Centre, Exhibition Place, brought out some 600 guests. Since its inception in 1989, Dancing With Our Stars has raised close to $15 million for Baycrest.

Presented by the Baycrest Foundation, the event paired community leaders with professional dance partners, to foxtrot, samba and tango their way into the hearts of the judges and audience.

Guest judges included musician-manager Jake Gold, dancer Jordan Clark and the host of the TV show Cityline, Tracy Moore. One of the evening's highlights was an impromptu Harlem Shake dance performed by hosts Dina Pugliese and Kevin Frankish, Canadian television personalities.

Dancing With Our Stars co-chairs were Warren Kimel, general manager and vice-president of Fabricland Distributors, as well as the chair of the Baycrest Foundation, and Keith Pelley, president of Rogers Media.

All of the fundraising occurred before the event. To raise funds, the dancers posted videos on YouTube so that sponsors could support a dancer. David Purdy was the top fundraiser.

The dancers each had their own personal reasons to dance for brain health.

Nicole Inwentash, 24, wanted to raise awareness in the younger generation about the issue of aging brain health with which many of her peers are unfamiliar. "Illness related to the aging brain can affect anyone," she said. "We want to have the best technology out there to help treat the illness, so when the time comes for the younger generation to need it, it's there," she told The CJN.

Purdy, a senior vice-president of Rogers Communications Inc., added, "Everyone has a family member or friend who is affected by aging brain health. That's why I'm putting my best foot forward to help Baycrest achieve its goals."

Dancer Joshua Wise, senior wealth adviser of Wise Wealth Management Group of Scotia McLeod, said, "This touches me personally because my immediate family is affected by Alzheimer's. Raising funds for this cause seemed like a worthy challenge."

Baycrest is a global leader and one of the world's most comprehensive centres for aging brain health.

"We provide wellness and outreach programs, residential housing, outpatient clinics, a long-term care home, a 300-bed hospital and an independent-living facility," said Susan Sutton, president of Baycrest Foundation and Baycrest's vice-president of global institutional advancement. "What that means is that our proven research can be applied immediately to help the people we serve, so our expertise is second to none."

Dr. Nicole Anderson, a senior scientist at the Rotman Research Institute at Baycrest, said how the brain ages and why some people's brains hold up better is a complex puzzle involving an interplay of genetic, environmental and lifestyle factors.

"Successful aging studies consistently point to a few fundamental qualities of a brain-health lifestyle," she said. "The overall message is to stay active, mentally, physically and socially. The most powerful thing we can do is engage in aerobic exercise."

Baycrest is still very Jewish, leaders stress

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Despite what some people may think or have heard, Baycrest wants you to know that it's still very much a Jewish institution.

Since 1918, when the Toronto Jewish Old Folks Home, the forerunner to the Baycrest Health Sciences, opened in downtown Toronto, Baycrest has maintained its deep Jewish roots, says Dr. William Reichman, its president and CEO.

As one of the most successful health-care institutions in the world, he said, "the Jewish guys got it right."

Speaking in an interview at Baycrest, along with Garry Foster, chair of the board of directors, Reichman said that at least 90 per cent of residents in long-term care are Jewish.

"We always open our doors to people in crisis, but Jewish people get first priority. The government has recognized that this is a special place for Jews. It has a Jewish 'tam,'" Reichman said.

To help serve their needs, Reichman said, Rabbi Geoffrey Haber came on board last year as the new director of spiritual care, and Baycrest's department of cultural, arts and innovation offers synagogue services, holiday celebrations and a Holocaust resource program.

"If anything, we have deeper Jewish roots. The community left us a legacy that we inherited. The depth of that feeling is so strong that it has never changed."

The history of the organization is one of visionary dreams, he said. "[As part of that vision] the Jewish community decided that it wasn't enough to take care of the people on Bathurst Street. Trying to [build upon a legacy] is not a new concept. Tikkun olam is part of Jewish philosophy."

That vision included the establishment in 1989 of Baycrest's Rotman Research Institute, which has scientists in the field of brain research studying memory, brain function and conditions such as Alzheimer's and strokes.

Reichman said that none of the money used by the Rotman Institute is money that would have gone to resident care and services.

"The vast majority of that money comes from outside funding. We have an $18-million annual research budget, and donors support 30 to 35 per cent of it. We [depend on] philanthropy to support [research] activities. We cannot conduct research unless we have money."

As the population ages, said Reichman, "we need this [research.] We have to bring in the best doctors, teachers, everyone, to find the next practice point of research."

A new theatre at Baycrest's Abe Posluns Auditorium, the Jacob Family Theatre, funded by Ellis Jacob, president and CEO of Cineplex Inc. in memory of his mother Tryphosa, will play a part in the research.

In addition to showing Hollywood movies for residents, it will also assist with tele-health and tele-education programs.

Foster said that Baycrest's reputation is resonating outside the Jewish community. "[Professionals] come to us on Bathurst Street to develop services to take to [countries all over the world.]"

Garry Foster and Dr. William Reichman

Foster stressed that "taking knowledge abroad does not mean we are leaving the Jewish community behind. It is our roots and the centre of what we do. We will never outgrow the community."

Baycrest is the jewel of the Canadian health-care system, Foster said. "We are world renowned, and we should be proud. This doesn't exist in the United States. [The community] built fertile ground [in order to] plant flowers in senior care."

Reichman said that with about 800 people waiting to get into its Apotex Centre long-term care residence, and other residents waiting to get into an alternative level of care, Baycrest needs to find solutions.

"This is a serious problem in Ontario. The solution is helping people stay at home, but we don't yet have the means to support people at home. We need to get the message out there that aging at home is an [appropriate strategy.]"

Independence, please!

Married With Kids

Lauren Kramer

My daughters are chomping at the bit for independence. These nine-year-old twins want to walk into the retail village 10 minutes from their front door in Richmond, B.C., order a hot chocolate at Starbucks and saunter around without the supervision of adult eyes.

Part of me would love to give them that freedom. But most of me is terrified something will happen. The cute, historic heart of our neighbourhood looks innocuous by day, its community centre, library and swimming pool heavily populated by young families. They spill out of the cafes, kids munching on croissants and parents tenderly clasping their coffee cups. It looks precisely like the kind of place where you'd want to raise a family, and for the most part, it is.

My neighbourhood is good at hiding secrets, but it's far from immune to the dark forces at work in cities throughout the country. Break-ins in the middle of the night are not uncommon, though shattered glass and busted door locks are fixed so quickly that no one knows they ever happened. Last summer some stranger tried to lure a 12-year-old toward his vehicle, and in recent months, a body was retrieved from the dykes that keep the Fraser River at bay.

As grown up as my little girls think they are, I can't trust them to know how to handle a frightening and potentially dangerous encounter. What choices would they make, and how could I risk exposing them to those situations?

My friend lectured his child never to accept anything from a stranger. "What would you say if someone tried to give you candy?" he asked, testing her later. "Thank you!" she replied enthusiastically.

"There are monsters out there," I try to tell my kids. "Some of them are people who are very sick, but don't know it. Trouble is, you can't tell they're sick by looking at them. Often, they look just like regular people." My girls look back at me with trusting eyes, trying to read between the lines. "We won't talk to anyone," they promise. "Please, just let us go!"

They've seen their older brother head into the village, almost always in the company of his friends and their skateboards. They'll cruise into McDonald's for some french fries, play a game of tag and skateboard down a few hills before returning home, flushed and exhilarated.

My girls want that same feeling, but I just can't give it to them. Not yet, anyway.

"When can we go, mom?" they plead. "When we're 10?"

That date is just a few months away, and I know I won't be ready then, either. The truth is that I don't know when the right time will come to give them freedom to explore. I want to enfold them in my embrace and protect them fiercely from leering eyes, from the danger of a stranger who might befriend them over a cup of hot chocolate at a place like Starbucks.

"Free hot chocolate!" they'd likely think. "I'll take it!"

The risks are way too high to release my girls into the world at large, even if that world is a small village close to home.

So for now, I say a resolute "No" to independence.

HONEY LIME TILAPIA

4 tilapia fillets • 2 eggs • 1 pkg potato pancake mix

MARINADE

2 tbsp lime juice (1 lg lime) • Zest of 1 lime • 1 tbl olive oil • 1 1/2 tbsp honey • 1/2 tsp black pepper • 1 clove garlic, finely minced

In a small bowl, whisk together lime juice, zest, olive oil, honey, salt, pepper and garlic. Place tilapia in very large ziploc bag; pour marinade on top of fish. Press air out of bag and seal. Lay bag in flat dish and turn over once or twice during marinading. Refrigerate at least 1 hr. or up to 4 hrs.

In small bowl, whisk eggs until frothy; in another bowl, pour in potato pancake mix. Dip each tilapia fillet into beaten eggs and then dredge in potato pancake mix coating both sides. Heat olive oil in large skillet over medium heat. Cook fillets 3-5 min. per side, avoiding overcrowding in pan. Serve immediately with lime wedges.

Hebrew web columnist Yossi Tastassa says the ancient holiday of Pesach has a very modern significance.

Six Canadian Jewish summer camps and 32 others in North America are to receive $1,000 each from the New York-based Jewish Teen Funders Network (JTFN) to develop teen philanthropy programs.

As part of the camp philanthropy program, participating camps will create their own teen-based "philanthropic foundations" and donate money to nonprofit organizations of their choosing.

The goal, said Stuart Guttman, director of Camp Massad in Quebec, is to get an early start in inculcating Jewish value-based principles of giving and to develop community leaders of the future.

The participating Canadian camps are Camp Massad in Quebec, Camp Kineret-Biluim in Quebec, Camp Kadimah in Nova Scotia, Camp Gesher and URJ (Union for Reform Judaism) Camp George in Ontario and JCC Camp Shalom in British Columbia.

Chains on my wrist

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

"And you shall tell your child on that day saying, 'It is because of this that the Lord did (all these miracles) when I left Egypt.'" – Shmot 13:8

This line in the Torah speaks to the commandment of relaying the story of the Exodus from Egypt to your children. It is a difficult mitzvah to fulfil because: a) we must have a clear understanding of how the children at the table learn, listen closely to their questions and you articulate the story well; b) we have an obligation to know the story well, which means we need to do our readings and have a precise knowledge of what we learn from our ancestors fleeing the Pharaoh through the hand of God; c) we tell the story in the first person ("It is because of this that the Lord did (all these miracles) when I left Egypt"), which means we must see ourselves as being part of the Exodus.

The first two requirements are challenging, but by making a true effort to study Yetziat Mitzrayim – the going out of Egypt – we should be able to accomplish our goals. But how do we live up to the third obligation – seeing ourselves as one of the Jews who crossed the sea while being chased by the Egyptians?

The following might help. Put a string around your wrists two days before the seder. Make it somewhat tight so that it leaves a mark similar to those left on the whipped bodies of our ancestral Jews who ran from Egypt in the dark of the night. Feel the pain on your body so that you can empathize with the children who were abused and mistreated by Egyptian taskmasters.

A week before you sit down at your Pesach table with your loved ones, create a list of 10 countries where people are enslaved today and study what that means. Know that the master can treat his slave in any way he sees fit, such as cutting off a limb if the child tries to flee. Study up on child soldiers in Uganda. This is what indeed occurs in 2013.

And remember while you study that the Egyptians used the bodies of our children to fill in gaps in the walls of the storehouses we were forced to build. Slavery is brutal. We were slaves in Egypt. Feel and sense that.

Be meditative. Don't waste your time at the seder hoping for it to end as early as possible. Rather, identify with the generations of Jewish men, women and children who suffered in chains. Ask yourself what it means to you that your history, where you came from, is not unlike that of African-Americans or the Roma, who were enslaved in the dark centuries of Europe.

As difficult as it is to imagine, know that someone else was entirely in control of your life, and God delivered you from their hands. That is the story of Pesach.

We the Jewish People were slaves, and despite the enormous freedoms and blessings we have today in Canada, Israel and around the world, our wrists were bound in chains and our backs were bloodied. That is our beginning. As gruesome as it sounds, you were a slave in Egypt.

Let Pesach move you, push you to grow as a Jew. We were slaves. God brought us out of Egypt. Tell the story just as if you were there. If you do, your children will listen, learn and be humbled. Chag Samayach.

Our lives have meaning

The youngster, above, munching his matzah, is clearly posing for the camera at a seder table set for many guests.

It appears he couldn't wait to sate his hunger, for he has already peeled an egg and nearly tipped over the bowl of salt water.

His youthfulness may grant him an exemption from patience, but it does not grant him exemption from the ceremony that is about to unfold around the elaborately and traditionally set table. Indeed his youthfulness guarantees him a major role in the ritual.

The whole point of the seder is to tell the story of our Exodus from Egyptian slavery some 3-1/2 millennia ago. Everyone at the table becomes a student of our history. But it is the children at whom we aim the evening's key lessons. This was always the intention for the uniquely marvellous evening we call layl seder Pesach. And the Haggadah is the text from which we teach those precious lessons. As Rabbi Marc Angel of the Institute for Jewish Ideas and Ideals in New York has noted, "The Haggadah provides a progressive framework of questions and answers, of engaging each person according to his/her ability and interest. It is an ancient document that can and should be made relevant to the most modern of moderns."

Editorial

The Haggadah is the prototypical instrument of teaching. Pesach is the prototypical occasion for teaching.

What we teach on Pesach, and indeed what we must teach day in and day out, is that our lives have meaning. Our history has meaning.

This is the central theme of the Jewish People's story.

New Funding

MONTREAL — A $2-million federal grant for the Segal Centre for Performing Arts was announced March 18 at the centre by federal Heritage Minister James Moore. The money matches dollar-for-dollar private donations to the centre's endowment fund, held and managed by the Jewish Community Foundation of Montreal. The funding comes from the endowment incentives program of the Canada Cultural Investment Fund, which encourages donations to arts groups. It received $658,000 in 2009 from the then-new program. The centre raises almost 90 per cent of its funding from donations and ticket sales, with the remainder coming from CJA Federation and government sources.

B.C. Prisoners Sue

VANCOUVER — A Jewish man is among eight prisoners in B.C. suing the federal government for cancelling funding for part-time chaplains last fall, saying it violates their Charter rights to freedom of religion by virtually eliminating the presence of non-Christian clergy in federal jails. Timothy Mitchell Nome, 38, who since signing on to the suit was transferred to a jail in New Brunswick, has joined two Buddhists, two Wiccans, two Muslims and a Sikh prisoner in the suit. It was filed in B.C. Supreme Court and sponsored by the West Coast Prison Justice Society, a prisoners rights group. Corrections Canada has laid off 49 part-time clergy, including 18 non-Christians. It said non-Christians can still be served by full-time Christian and Muslim clergy and volunteers, but the prisoners group says there are no minority chaplains in B.C.

Host Apologizes For Anti-Roma Rant

TORONTO — Controversy-courting Jewish TV host Ezra Levant apologized for a rant against Roma people.

Levant of the Sun TV network sparked widespread outrage in September when he referred to Roma as "Gypsies" and "a culture synonymous with swindlers... one of the central characteristics of that culture is that their chief economy is theft and begging."

Ezra Levant

He also said: "The phrase 'Gypsy' and 'cheater' have been so interchangeable historically that the word has been entered into the English language as a verb: he gypped me. Well, the Gypsies have gypped us. Too many have come here as false refugees."

The segment, titled "The Jews versus the Gypsies," aired amid reports of a crime ring of Romanian immigrants in Toronto. The Roma community has asked Toronto police to investigate Levant for hate crimes.

"To those I hurt, I'm sorry," Levant said in his March 18 apology. "It's just wrong to slur a group of people. I made the moral mistake of judging people collectively."

He added, "I don't apologize simply for the sake of being consistent in my views. I regret having made these statements and I'm hopeful that those remarks will serve as an example of what not to do when commenting on social issues."

Sun News apologized for the segment last fall and pulled it from its website. Some said Levant's apology is suspiciously timed, as the Sun network is in the midst of asking the broadcast regulator for space on basic cable.

WORLD

Shout Out To Jews

ROME — Pope Francis acknowledged Jews in the open-air mass formally installing him as pontiff. Francis began his homily March 19 by greeting Catholic dignitaries in the huge crowd in St. Peter's Square. He thanked representatives of other churches and faiths as well as "representatives of the Jewish community." In the crowd were Rome's chief rabbi, Riccardo Di Segni, and the president of Rome's Jewish community. It's said to be the first time Rome's chief rabbi has attended a papal inauguration. Pope Benedict XVI, invited the rabbi to his in 2005, but it was the first day of Pesach, so he declined.

Film fest highlights emerging filmmakers

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

When the 21st annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival (TJFF) opens to the public on April 10, it will bring with it the usual fine mix of movies that entertain, challenge and educate.

The CJN will be reviewing some of the festival's 100 or so films in upcoming editions and on our website.

The presentation of quality films aside, the TJFF executives are also on a twofold mission: courting future fest-goers and preserving the past.

In terms of the former, the festival has made a concerted effort to engage a younger demographic, and is sourcing films that "aren't your bubbie's" cup of tea, said TJFF managing director Debbie Werner.

"Today's films are not the same as we were showing 21 years ago. They're new, by emerging filmmakers," she said. "They tell fresh stories through fresh eyes. Some of the themes are familiar, but they're being reinterpreted with a fresh perspective."

Werner said that sometimes the festival gets "trapped" by its name, because many young Jews feel they need to look toward a "more secular" venue to get their arts and culture.

"So they overlook us just because of our name. [Youths] think we're going to be a religious experience," she said. "Yes, we do offer stuff for those looking to learn from a religious standpoint, but we also offer tons to those looking to learn culturally about what the Jewish experience is worldwide. The festival is the story of the Diaspora."

As such, before this year's official festival opening, the organizers held a prescreening of Polish Bar, an edgy indie film directed by Chicago native Ben Berkowitz that looks at the life of a Jewish DJ in his 20s struggling with his own moral code and connection to Judaism as he works the turntables in a strip club.

TJFF also has a long-running program aimed at Jewish and non-Jewish students called FilmMatters. The education outreach initiative invites schools from around the city to participate in screening Jewish films for cross-cultural, bridge-building purposes.

Debbie Werner, managing director of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival

"The beautiful thing about this program is that it brings kids from all walks of life and ethnicities together," Werner said, "and it breaks down the barriers of their surface differences and let's them see that they share similar interests."

On the preservation front, Werner said she hopes that an archive of Jewish stories committed to celluloid – and digitally – will provide the Jewish community, a resource for future generations.

The TJFF is working to set up its "dream project," the Toronto Jewish Media Library, an online archive of films for posterity. It would be the first of its kind. What it lacks is the funding to get it done.

We must not close our eyes

From the editor's desk...

It was very surprising, indeed disappointing, to see that former prime minister Jean Chrétien attended the recent funeral of Hugo Chavez. Chrétien went there as a private individual, not as an emissary of the Canadian government conveying a gesture of condolence to the government and people of Venezuela.

According to the Globe and Mail, Chrétien acknowledged that Chavez "went probably too far" in his policies, but he still nevertheless "felt it [going to the funeral] was the right thing to do."

In trying to explain, however, why he felt it was the right thing to do, the former prime minister relied on a series of straw man justifications that fall away in the light breeze of examination.

"I respect the people of Venezuela" Chrétien said.

It would be quite difficult to find many normal-thinking individuals anywhere on the planet who did not respect the people of Venezuela. The people of Venezuela were not the problem with the politics of its leader. It was Chavez's deeply distasteful, manipulative demagoguery. Disdain for him did not extend to his people.

"He was very much on the side of the poor and we have to think of the poor in any society. I'm not the type of guy who thinks the crumbs on the table are enough for the poor, either there or in Canada," Chrétien said.

Chrétien's sentiment is unassailably admirable. It happens, however, to be the sentiment of most caring people. None of us should think the crumbs on the table are enough for any living soul. But that sentiment is quite irrelevant to the main point about Chavez.

Since when does being on the side of the poor require one to be viciously antisemitic, actively destructive of democratic institutions and wholeheartedly supportive of the main state sponsor of terrorism?

One gets the sense that the former prime minister was evading the simple truth of why he went. He liked Hugo Chavez. He even joked with Chavez about baseball! So, out of respect for the man he once liked, he went to the funeral.

The late president of Venezuela was the most ardent, non-Muslim backer and ally of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Presumably, he was also a backer of Ahmadinejad's ideas and policies toward Israel, Jews and the Shoah.

The late president of Venezuela let loose a state-run apparatus that mercilessly targeted and scapegoated the Jews of Venezuela, so much so that nearly two-thirds of the community fled the country.

Why could Chrétien not draw a line in the moral sand?

At what point does a friendship based somewhat loosely, we presume, on a long-ago expressed, shared affection for baseball, step aside for the sake of honouring the principle that inciting hatred of the Jews is wholly intolerable?

Is it sufficient justification for attending Chavez funeral to say, as Chrétien did, "A lot of people love him there?"

One need not look too far into the pages of history or onto the pages of current events to see demagogues, political firebrands, strongmen or tyrants enjoying the affection of a lot of their people. But surely we must test the nature of a ruler by his policies, his deeds, not by the extent of the "love" of his people.

It is hard to imagine that the former prime minister was unaware of Chavez's appalling policies. And it is harder still to imagine that Chrétien condoned them in any way. Despite his personal distaste for the way Hugo Chavez singled out of the Jews of Venezuela for collective opprobrium and national suspicion, Chrétien still believed "it was the right thing to do."

This is what disappointed most: Chrétien closed his eyes to the larger, truer picture of Chavez's nature and of Chavez's policies.

And that is how antisemitism – or any bigotry and prejudice – in all its hateful, dangerous aspects slowly, insidiously edges closer toward the mainstream of social and political discourse even in fair-minded societies: good, decent people find a way to close their eyes to it.

We cannot leave the subject of closing one's eyes to the evils encouraged by others without pointing out that Turkish Prime Minister Tayyip Erdogan must have been stunned by the strong reaction to his statement last month that Zionism was a "crime against humanity."

For he clumsily, and not very convincingly, tried to recant.

"Everyone should know that my criticism [is about] certain cases, particularly Gaza and the settlements, and directed against Israeli policy," Erdogan told the Danish newspaper Politieken via email, ahead of his visit last week to Denmark. "It is quite natural for us to continue to criticize Israel, as long as it has not abandoned its denial of the Palestinian state's right to exist."

We could believe Erdogan's apology was sincere if it too did not contain more lies within it. But, alas, it did.

We will not, however, close our eyes to the true picture of Erdogan's nature or of his policies. –*MBD

Out of Cold program helps homeless create art

Vicky Toblanah
Special to the CJN

In the basement of Beth Sholom Synagogue, homeless people from all over Toronto gather every Tuesday night during the winter to eat, sleep – and paint.

That's how Paul Shields, a homeless man living in Toronto, turned into an artist. Shields, who had a stroke and suffers from other medical conditions, began to rebuild his confidence by painting, learning that he could change his path in life.

The program, run in conjunction with Beth Tzedec Congregation, is part of the larger citywide Out of the Cold volunteer initiative, for which synagogues, churches and other faith centres open their doors to the city's homeless one night a week, during the coldest months of the year.

But some places like to offer more than just a mattress and a plate of dinner. For volunteer Melanie Cheskes, it's also a place to let the guests' worries subside, at least for one night. That's why she runs the Art Circle, a program that allows guests to do artwork when they come to Out of the Cold. The paintings are later framed and sold at the annual Out of the Cold Art Show in April. All the proceeds are split between the artists and Out of the Cold.

"You can see their confidence when they come in," said Cheskes, who has a background in fine arts and is now pursuing social work. "For them, it's an escape from the week, but for me as well."

That's how Peter T. feels. He says he was hesitant to get involved in painting at first, only coming for a warm dinner and a place to sleep. "I thought, 'Oh, I'll never be able to do this,' but I don't know what it is. Everyone has their hidden potential," said Peter, 53. "It allows me to refocus my energy that might have been spent thinking about my problems."

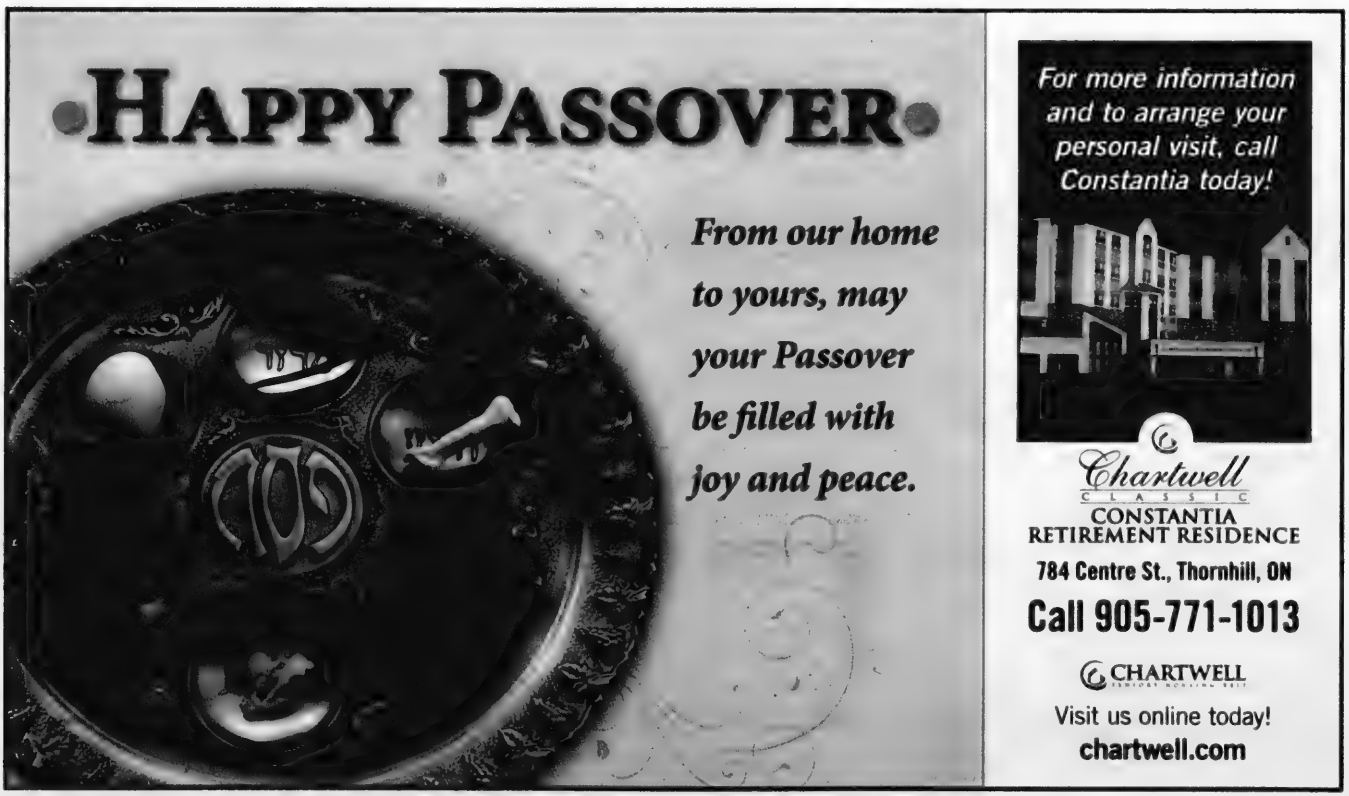
The artists don't do it to make money, said Cheskes – some paintings will sell for around $50 at the art show – but rather to feel as if they contributed to something, and have created something they're proud of. The majority of the artists are homeless or living in extremely impoverished circumstances, but that doesn't stop artists like Michael from refusing to take a penny for his work. "I always push him to take the money."

When Shields' painting sold at the art show last year, he said it changed his life. "I've been disadvantaged for many years," he said. "It told me, maybe I can do something. I think I was lost. It opened a door for me." As a result of his success, he sold a few more paintings and now designs and sells greeting cards, too.

It's these positive experiences that drive the volunteers, especially Brenda Berger and Maureen Tanz, who run Beth Sholom and Beth Tzedec's Out of the Cold program, now in its 14th year. The ability to help the less fortunate is what encourages them. "I like the satisfaction of helping others. I get a chance to talk to them one on one and make them feel special," said Tanz.

On average, 150 to 200 people show up for dinner at Beth Sholom, but there's only room to sleep 55. "The number has definitely increased," said Tanz. "They come back year after year, and you really get to know them."

The Art Circle's fourth annual art exhibition and fundraiser takes place on April 14, 1 to 3 p.m. at Beth Sholom, 1445 Eglinton Ave. W. It's open to the public. To volunteer or donate clothing, contact Beth Sholom or Beth Tzedec. For more information about the Art Circle, visit http://ootcartcircle.wordpress.com.



Is CIJA better or worse than what came before?

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

It's been two years since Canada's mainstream Jewish advocacy groups were amalgamated under the umbrella of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA).

As part of that process, venerable institutions such as the 90-year-old Canadian Jewish Congress and the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) – which had both been effectively controlled by CIJA's predecessor organization since 2004 – disappeared as independent entities.

Community Advocacy

First of a two-part series

The Quebec-Israel Committee, National Jewish Campus Life (Hillel's parent organization) and the University Outreach Committee were some of the other groups that were absorbed by CIJA.

The aim of the changes, as stated by community leaders in 2011, was to save money and streamline pro-Israel and Jewish activities by speaking with one voice on both domestic and foreign affairs.

But is the Jewish community better off now than it was before?

Proponents of the changes pointed to a need to reduce overlap among existing groups and to "clarify and unify" Jewish advocacy here and abroad.

Shimon Fogel, CIJA's CEO, told The CJN at the time that "the lines and distinctions between what they used to call 'the domestic agenda' and 'the Israel agenda' have blurred so much that it's impossible really to tell one from the other. When is it anti-Zionism? When is it antisemitism? This is the nature of where things have gone internationally."

Fogel said these distinctions had become "increasingly artificial," to the point where it became difficult for Congress and CIC to determine which agency should respond to what issues.

"We had an opportunity to integrate and consolidate all the thematic agendas – campus, antisemitism, Israel relations, social policy agenda at the local community level – all of those things could be brought into one holistic institution," he said.

Critics, however, said the changes were made undemocratically at the behest of large donors who wanted a greater say in how the community responded to a perceived increase in delegitimization efforts against Israel.

Many also bemoaned the loss of long-standing and highly respected agencies, particularly Canadian Jewish Congress, whose leadership was elected from among member groups from across Canada through regular regional and national plenaries.

The critics say the new CIJA structure doesn't employ the same democratic process and note that CIJA's board is appointed, not elected.

Mira Sucharov

Sally Zerker, a professor emeritus at York University, is still angry about the way Congress was dismantled.

"It was a totally undemocratic process. Congress wasn't shelved – it was destroyed. There was no foundation for the decisions [that CIJA] made. The problem for CIJA, as far as I'm concerned, is that they don't represent the Canadian Jewish community," Zerker said.

"CIJA has no basis to exist other than for some connected men getting together and making a decision," she added.

"I have no objection to any group of people organizing any kind of organization and supporting it themselves. However, these organizers of CIJA speak as if they're representing the community, but they don't. There was a time, not long ago, when we used to vote for the head of Congress and its directors. That has gone by the wayside."

Other critics, mostly on the left, argue that some pro-Israel voices are being excluded in the new environment.

Mira Sucharov, an associate professor of political science at Carleton University in Ottawa and a progressive Zionist, said CIJA has presided over a "narrowing in the type of dialogue" about Israel that is restricted to what the organization deems to be appropriate.

"My vantage point is college campuses, and there I see a disturbing attempt to police the kind of discussion that Jewish students may engage in within the auspices of their Hillel organizations," she told The CJN.

For example, Sucharov said Jewish students at Carleton were discouraged from meeting with Peter Beinart, a controversial Jewish journalist and academic from the United States who favours a boycott of products made in the West Bank and is a harsh critic of Israel's policies towards the Palestinians.

CIJA seen as both positive and negative

"A prime example of this was CIJA's official 'recommendation' to Hillel organizations to refuse to engage with Beinart –who is undoubtedly one of the most prominent North American voices of his generation regarding contemporary Zionism and U.S.-Israel relations – when he came on a three-city tour of Canada last fall," Sucharov said.

"The organizers of his trip – the New Israel Fund, Ameinu [a progressive Zionist group] and Canadian Friends of Peace Now – approached Hillel organizations to see if the students would like to meet with Beinart, and they were told no."

Sucharov also believes CIJA has shifted the Jewish community's official advocacy position to the right on the political spectrum.

"CIJA's actions have made groups like the ones I mentioned above experience their form of 'pro-Israel' advocacy as outside the tent of official Canadian Jewish organizing," she said. "And this, I think, is very unfortunate for the health and vigour of the Canadian Jewish community as it relates to Canada-Israel and Diaspora-Israel relations."

Harold Waller

CIJA spokesperson Steve McDonald categorically denied that his organization instructed Hillel to stay away from Beinart. "We don't tell Hillels what to do. Hillels work out their advocacy programming locally in concert with their federation. We provide national support, particularly in the form of training, resources, and advice," he said.

McDonald added that tour organizers asked multiple Hillels if they wanted to host Beinart, shortly after he wrote an article in the New York Times advancing his boycott argument. "Those Hillels in turn asked us for advice, to which we shared our own policy and encouraged Jewish communal organizations to adopt a similar policy. Our position that we don't provide a platform for [advocates of boycotts, divestments and sanctions against Israel] – i.e., sponsor or host, and in turn use our communal resources to promote – is utterly different from 'don't speak to or engage with.'"

Harold Waller, a political science professor at McGill University and a longtime observer of Canada's Jewish communal structures, says CIJA's impact has been both positive and negative.

"There are undoubtedly some members of the community who believe that the present arrangement imposes excessive community discipline… [but] on the positive side, the community purportedly speaks with one voice to other Canadians and even those beyond Canada's shores," said Waller, who sits on the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research's academic council.

"Presumably this enables us to husband our resources and deploy them in a more cost-effective way."

Another benefit to the CIJA-led advocacy structure has been "the opportunity for a more rational allocation of resources devoted to advocacy and… presumably clearer statements of community positions," Waller said.

As well, CIJA now has access to more federation resources and funds from "private benefactors," he said.

But, Waller added, there's been criticism about CIJA's perceived lack of democratic accountability, as well as its "presumptions regarding being the main spokesperson" for the Jewish community.

Furthermore, there's been a lack of "any forum or mechanism [within CIJA] to work out disparate points of view on the issues that we must address."

In addition, Waller highlighted the lingering resentment among some community members who believe Congress was abandoned too easily.

"The advantage of Congress was that it represented a wide range of Jewish organizations, so it could speak authoritatively. CIJA basically comes from the federation movement. It can also claim to have wide backing from all the individuals who donate to their local [federation] campaigns, but that kind of representation is far different from what Congress claimed to have."

CIJA could also do a better job in making itself known to the community, he said.

"I am sure that people in government and politics know what CIJA is, but I doubt that members of the general public really understand its significance," Waller said, noting that the Jewish community likely understood how Congress functioned, given its long-standing role.

Still, he believes that most Canadian Jews are "satisfied" with CIJA so far, and that there are fewer dissenters today than in 2011, although they're still outspoken, particularly those who are passionate about Congress' legacy.

When asked whether Congress' absence and CIJA's ascendance have helped other community advocacy organizations carve out a more prominent role for themselves, Waller said he doesn't think so.

He said CIJA's only real rival is B'nai Brith Canada, but in his view, its efforts have been unaffected by CIJA.

"I don't know of any other Canadian Jewish community organization [aside from B'nai Brith] with a truly national presence that can claim to be an alternative to CIJA," he said.

Asked whether he thought the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center Canada (FSWC) has had a greater impact as a communal organization since Congress' demise, Waller said no.

FSWC "appears to be a small-scale operation with a limited range of concerns," he said.

Secure the chain

"Jews were the first to make the momentous claim that history has meaning. It is not merely a sequence of disconnected events, but the long story of humanity's response to, or rebellion against, the voice of God as it echoes in the conscience of mankind," Rabbi Jonathan Sacks writes.

The Exodus from Egypt is the pivotal moment of collective Jewish history. And though we recount that moment countless times in our daily prayers, it is around the seder table that we do so as a community of family and friends.

The importance of doing so cannot be overstated. The American scholar Jacob Neusner has elegantly explained why. "Civilization hangs suspended from generation to generation by the gossamer strand of memory. If only one cohort of mothers and fathers fails to convey to its children what it has learned from its parents, then the great chain of learning and wisdom snaps."

It is fitting, therefore, during this prototypical occasion for teaching, that we embed Neusner's statement deep in our hearts.

We are – all of us – the guardians of the great chain of the learning and the wisdom that we call Judaism. We dare not let the chain snap. We dare not let it fall from our hands.

And yet the evidence is overwhelming that so many of the links of the chain are not holding. There is a palpably loosening sense of community among younger Jews here and abroad that bodes ill for the civilization that has been our treasure, our heritage and our future.

The surest way to strengthen the gossamers of our collective memory, to protect that great chain is by building a comprehensive, communal infrastructure of education. We do not have that. We have a fine system for some, a partial system for a few and no system for too many.

Our community must re-examine, rethink and revise the current educational infrastructure. It is no longer adequate to the urgent needs of our time. The utter unaffordability of a day-school education for the vast majority of families is only one of many pressing education issues. But it's not the only one.

The fraying of the chain should stab at the collective conscience of our community. That it does not is unpardonable.

We must not be the cohort of mothers and fathers that fails its children. Indeed, why can we not be the cohort that rises above the defeatist resignation that says nothing more, nothing different, can be done?

Perhaps it was for this reason we were born at this time? To show it can be done. To build an infrastructure of education for everyone engaging each person according to his/her ability. To secure the chain in our community for all time.

Chag Samayach.

Jewish groups were outraged after a Toronto Star editorial praised a controversial speech by external affairs minister Joe Clark that criticized Israel's response to unrest in Gaza and the West Bank. The Star said it was "a necessary reminder to members of the Jewish community that they're citizens of Canada, not Israel."

A message from the premier

On behalf of the government of Ontario, I am delighted to extend warm greetings to members of the Jewish community as they mark Pesach. Religious pluralism has played a major role in shaping our unique identity as a province. I would like to thank Ontario's Jewish community for enriching our multifaith society, and to acknowledge its invaluable contributions to the social, cultural and economic life of our province.

The story of Passover is one of redemption and freedom, themes that are central to this important family celebration and much-loved holiday. And it is a festival that is rich in meaning and in ritual, evoking, among other things, fond memories of seders past, the joy that only a gathering of family can bring and the passing down of cherished traditions from generation to generation. I wish all members of our province's Jewish community a Pesach filled with happiness. Chag Kasher v'Samayach!

Cost of Jewish education

Given all of the attention being paid to Jewish day school tuition, and rightly so, it might be of interest to some people what other communities outside of the Jewish community have to say about tuition. I recently attended an Ontario Federation of Independent Schools (OFIS) seminar and spoke with several principals and board members from Christian schools. The discussions were enlightening.

The fact that Rehoboth Christian School had tuition that was about one-third of our typical elementary Jewish school and that their university placement rate is equivalent to our schools and that they also bemoan the lack of government funding, as we do, was not surprising. Rather, what astounded me was that these individuals took great pride in their successful efforts to keep tuition low, resulting in the growth of one school to approximately 600 children, in a small community!

This sensitivity and understanding of the benefits of keeping tuition low seems to have been lost or at least moved down the totem pole pretty far below most other considerations in our community. In fact, the argument that the quality of our education is paramount seems somewhat perverse. As our schools engage in a race to the top of the quality ladder, the barrier to entry rises, enrolments decline and fewer parents can keep up. Surely we can do better.

A communal response is long overdue to this most pressing problem. New initiatives are taking place across the border in Jewish schools, while we in Ontario boast if our tuition only rises a few percentage points above inflation. Everyone is in favour of top-quality Jewish education, but the question we need to be asking is: at what cost? We need some fresh new ideas – now!

Palliative care

In reference to the question about whether palliative care takes into account halachic restrictions that would force interventions during end-of-life treatment, we need to ask ("Palliative care," letter, March 14):

- What is in the the patient's best interest?
- Can the use of these interventions return the patient to his previous life that was not full of suffering?
- Is artificial nutrition associated with unnecessary suffering that provides little clinical benefit?

Rabbi Moshe Feinstein stated, "For a patient with pain and suffering who cannot be cured and cannot live much longer, it is not obligatory to administer medical therapy to prolong life."

In Baycrest's palliative care unit, antibiotics and morphine are administered to enable the patient to breathe more easily. Decisions are made using a multi-disciplinary approach that includes family, geriatric doctors, psychiatrists, the ethical department and clergy to sustain life as long as possible with as little pain as possible.

Did Obama and Netanyahu narrow the gaps?

Raphael Ahren
The Times of Israel

Remember May 2011, when Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu humiliated U.S. President Barack Obama by delivering what the Wall Street Journal called a "rare public rebuke" of the president, telling him, in the Oval Office, in what amounted to a public lecture, that Israel cannot withdraw to the 1967 lines? Remember when, later that year, Obama was overheard saying to Nicolas Sarkozy that the French president might be fed up with the Israeli leader, "but I have to deal with him even more often than you"? Or remember, last September, when Netanyahu came to America to speak to the United Nations but Obama couldn't find the time to meet him?

After the first day of Obama's first presidential visit to Jerusalem, any previous disagreements between him and the Israeli premier seemed so distant, from so different an era, it was almost as though they had never existed.

If Obama's goal was to launch a charm offensive rather than to kick-start the peace process or kick anything else, he was hitting all the right notes with his good friend "Bibi." And Netanyahu was giving him the warm "Barack" treatment straight back. Settlement freeze? Never heard of it. Arguments over Iran? Please, our positions could not be closer.

Quarrelling in public was in the past. Today, we have two leaders who were recently re-elected and would have us believe they've realized they have little choice but to get along for the next few years. Might as well make nice and try to get things done amicably.

Obama got right into it. "Tov lihiyot shuv ba'aretz" — It's good to be back in Israel, he said, right at the beginning of his first speech, minutes after he emerged from Air Force One. He then hurried to remedy the glaring omission from his 2009 Cairo speech, in which he seemed to imply that Israel's right to exist is based on the Holocaust, as opposed to the then-unmentioned Jewish nation's ancient historic sovereign connection to the Land of Israel.

"More than 3,000 years ago, the Jewish People lived here, tended the land here, prayed to God here," Obama reminded us and himself, (though unfortunately probably not much of the Arab world, which doesn't tend to tune in to Ben-Gurion Airport welcome ceremonies). "And after centuries of exile and persecution, unparalleled in the history of man, the founding of the Jewish State of Israel was a rebirth, a redemption unlike any in history."

Such words even pleased right-wing Jewish Home leader and Economics and Trade Minister Naftali Bennett: "It's an important speech that recognizes the deep historical connection between the people of Israel and the Land of Israel," he declared soon after.

After affirming the Jewish nation's indigenousness to the region and calling Israel a "Jewish state," Obama waxed biblical: "Today, the sons of Abraham and the daughters of Sarah are fulfilling the dream of the ages – to be masters of their own fate in their own sovereign state. And just as we have for these past 65 years, the United States is proud to stand with you as your strongest ally and your greatest friend."

In this first speech, what's more, Obama did not so much as utter the words "Palestine" or "Palestinians," merely speaking of "your neighbours."

Later, at the President's residence, Obama termed Jerusalem "the Eternal City" – a nice epithet, although he unsurprisingly stopped short of calling it Israel's capital. He did, though, throw in an anecdote from the Talmud, about a man who plants trees for his children.

Subsequent photo-ops with children – and there were plenty of them at the President's residence – are the easy part of trips like this. The difficult part is where two world leaders, who have very different political convictions, grapple with the real issues of life-and-death import to their nations.

But throughout the day, even after hours of such talks, the president and the prime minister sounded like best friends, joking about Obama's fake mustache and Netanyahu seeing red lines everywhere. When Obama quipped that Netanyahu's "very good looking" sons clearly got their looks from their mother, Netanyahu instantly responded: "Well, I could say the same of your daughters." What a double act.

U.S. President Barack Obama and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu stroll together after the president's arrival in Israel last Wednesday. (Israel Sun photo)

There were also sombre personal moments, such as when Obama quoted Netanyahu's fallen brother, Yoni. They only underlined the effort to show how much relations had improved. Netanyahu later said he was very moved by the gesture.

Heck, they even looked like best friends, easy in each other's company, especially when the prime minister followed the president's lead and they took off their suit jackets as they strode around Ben-Gurion Airport.

"Thank you for the investment you have made in our relationship, and in strengthening the friendship and alliance between our two countries. It is deeply, deeply, appreciated," Netanyahu told the president at a joint press conference in the evening, cementing the tone of partnership.

It's not yet clear what exactly was or was not resolved during the five-hour talks in the prime minister's residence regarding steps toward Palestinian statehood and steps to thwart Iran's nuclear drive. It's more than possible that the BFF display simply means the two have grown up and learned to grin and bear their differences.

But when they did discuss matters of substance, there were signs of a narrowing of gaps.

"Israel remains fully committed to peace and to the solution of two states for two peoples," Netanyahu said, giving Obama an explicit endorsement of Palestinian statehood that will rankle with many members of his own new coalition.

And the president "very much welcomed Bibi's words." He also admitted that he could have been "more deft" during his first term in trying to tackle the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. "It takes a confluence of both good diplomatic work but also timing, serendipity, things falling into place at the right time, the right players feeling that this is the moment to seize it.

"There have probably been times where when I've made statements about what I think needs to happen. The way it gets filtered through our press, it may be interpreted in ways that get Israelis nervous," Obama added.

Does that mean he's not going to try to twist Israeli arms? Let's not get carried away. But for now, he said, he's following his mom's advice – to listen before he talks.

On Iran, too, the rhetoric suggested a greater co-ordination.

"I'm absolutely convinced that the president is determined to prevent Iran from getting nuclear weapons," Netanyahu said.

But don't you and the president have different timetables, reporters asked?

His response sought to explain "a misunderstanding."

Manufacturing a nuclear weapon would indeed take about a year, he said, echoing Obama's stated timeline. The red line he drew at the United Nations in the fall hasn't been crossed yet, he added. His concern is over Iran completing the enrichment stage so that it can more speedily break out to the bomb.

"But we do have a common assessment on these schedules, on intelligence," Netanyahu asserted. "We share that intelligence and we don't have any argument about it. I think it's important to state that clearly."

Obama concurred. "There's not a lot of daylight between our country's assessments in terms of where Iran is right now," he said. The Israeli prime minister "is absolutely correct" in saying that each country "has to make its own decision when it comes to the awesome decision to engage in any kind of military action. And Israel is differently situated than the United States. And I would not expect that the prime minister [would] make a decision about his country's security and defer that to any other country."

So we're all on the same page then? Again, let's not go too far. Obama is still talking up diplomacy, and Netanyahu is still praising the president for acknowledging Israel's right to protect itself as it deems necessary. That sounds like more than a little daylight.

Concluding the press conference, Netanyahu expressed the hope that all Israelis "should get to know President Obama the way I've gotten to know him."

Such niceties continued on Thursday morning, when Obama marvelled at ancient Bibles and super-modern nanotechnology.

In his speech on Thursday, Obama set out his vision for peace. When Obama returns home, internalizes what he's been listening to, and starts talking, we will know more about how much his vision is consistent with that of Netanyahu.

Let's hope the coalition succeeds, for Israel's sake

My mom tells me I should write more positively about Israel in this column, because there are too many people denigrating Israel incessantly. My usual response is that I'm not responsible for hasbarah (propaganda) and prefer to tell things as I see them from here in the Holy Land.

But I also want to make my mother happy (don't we all), so this time I'll try.

I had very low expectations going into January's Knesset elections. Polls showed no real change in the offing and that we were heading for another four to five years of stagnation on issues of importance to many of us Israelis.

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

True, the outgoing government succeeded on some fronts. Working hand in hand with the Bank of Israel, the country weathered the global economic meltdown better than most western countries. It accelerated important national infrastructure projects – major highways and new railways. Cellphone rates dropped because communication minister Moshe Kahalon broke the industry cartel. And in the wake of nationwide protests during the summer of 2011, the government now subsidizes certain preschool tuitions, saving money for young families.

But Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's previous government didn't deal with several issues that were the focus of popular discontent, most significantly the sentiment of many non-haredi citizens that they alone bear burdens central to the being of this country. Nothing irks these Israelis more than the thousands of exemptions from military service given annually to haredi young men.

He also didn't do enough to advance dialogue between Israel and the Palestinians aimed at reaching a solution to the decades-long stalemate at the heart of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

While pre-election polls forecasted a slight drop in support for Netanyahu's Likud-Beitenu, they generally predicted a larger plurality for the right, projecting an especially strong showing for the hawkish, Orthodox Bayit Yehudi (Jewish Home) party under the leadership of its young, charismatic leader, Naftali Bennett.

The election results were, therefore, a genuine surprise, particularly the showing of newcomer Yair Lapid's Yesh Atid (There is a Future) party, which won 19 seats and became the second-largest Knesset faction. It was supported by many disillusioned midstream voters looking for something different. Lapid put together an eclectic list of potential MKs from very divergent walks of Israeli life, many of whom came with impressive personal track records of their own.

But Yesh Atid wasn't the only faction to bring hope for a different Knesset in the form of a cadre of young, motivated and talented individuals. All told, 48 of the 120 MKs are completely new. Yesh Atid's rookie MK Ruth Calderon, a secular female Talmud scholar, made a maiden Knesset speech that was watched by tens of thousands on the Internet. It brought tears to my eyes with its promise of a better Israel, unlike the one many have become disheartened with.

Soon after the elections, President Shimon Peres tasked Netanyahu with forming a new government. He immediately began negotiations with the different factions, and it quickly became clear that Lapid and Bennett (whose Bayit Yehudi received 12 seats) had created an alliance without which no government could be formed. It also became clear they were changing the rules. They banded together to ensure a new government would actually deal with haredi army enlistment, keeping both haredi parties out of the coalition. And they united in demanding fewer ministers in the new government, in line with Lapid's pledge during the election campaign.

When the proverbial white smoke finally came out of the negotiation room after six weeks of talks (on the same day actual white smoke emerged from the chimney of the Sistine Chapel announcing the selection of Pope Francis), Israel got a new, slimmed-down government and some genuine hope for a better future.

Critics and cynics abound. The new government is too right wing and won't move peace talks with the Palestinians forward. It has too many inexperienced ministers, particularly with a huge budget cut on the books. Beyond the haredi enlistment plan, the Lapid-Bennett alliance won't hold water.

Perhaps these detractors are right. The new leader of the Opposition, Labor party head Shelly Yachimovich, and her own capable cadre of new Knesset members will try to prove that they are.

To paraphrase a saying my mom taught me: the proof of the pudding will be in the eating. Good luck to us all!

Politics, Pharaoh and Passover

The biblical account of the Exodus, recounted every year at the Passover seder, tells us that the Israelite slaves departed in triumph after the entire Egyptian nation – from top to bottom – was decimated by the 10 plagues, including the killing of the first born. While Moses and Aaron went through the motions of negotiation with Pharaoh, they did not engage in real dialogue, seek to understand the inner motivations, culture and psychology of the Egyptians, or offer any significant concessions. No third-party mediators were invited to encourage compromise and co-operation, and if groups like Human Rights Watch and Amnesty International (and a few "independent" Jewish voices) had been around, they would have published reports and held press conferences condemning Moses as a war criminal.

In somewhat more modern terms, the story of the Exodus and the Jewish Bible in general reflect political realism, and what philosopher Thomas Hobbes described as "war of all against all" in the anarchy of politics among nations. Indeed, Hobbes incorporated significant parts of the biblical analysis and Jewish history, including the precept that when faced with the threat of destruction, one must arise early and attack first.

In the 21st century, however, this recognition of the need for security and power – military, economic, diplomatic, and in other forms – to survive in a world filled with hate and violence has been erased by the myth that political conflicts are simply the result of misunderstanding, psychological stress and cultural differences. Sadly, Jewish intellectuals and academics with personal axes to grind and only a shallow knowledge of their own history are often at the forefront of this false political religion. Modern-day Pharaohs, oppressors, and terrorists – particularly among Arab and Islamist leaders – are portrayed as victims (the late PA Authority president Yasser Arafat was a prominent example), while the application of military force is automatically condemned as "excessive," "illegal," and "immoral."

Similarly, the concept and understanding of justice that is essential to the Passover story has been distorted and twisted beyond recognition by the high priests of today's political correctness. The events of the Exodus begin with the enslavement of the Israelites followed by the inhuman drowning of male babies, while the plagues and suffering visited on the Egyptians ("indiscriminate force," according to Human Rights Watch) were necessary for justice to prevail. There was no other way to end the enslavement and defeat the tormenters. It was not the suffering of the ordinary Egyptians that was celebrated as the Israelites left, but rather their own taste of freedom. Indeed, on Passover, we are enjoined to abbreviate the celebration in the Hallel prayer (psalms of exultation) out of respect for the dead Egyptians, also acknowledged as God's creatures.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

However, in today's world of public relations, political propaganda, and invented "narratives" instead of history, the connection between cause and effect is often lost. The emphasis on, and sympathy for, the "suffering of the Palestinians" that is widely embraced, even by many well-meaning Jews, erases the racist Arab rejectionism and brutal attacks of 1947-1948, and six more decades of terror and war. And telling the story of Israeli "occupation" and "settlements" without the history of the 1967 war and then-Egyptian President Gamal Abdel Nasser's efforts to "push the Jews into the sea" is like reciting the Passover Haggadah without enslavement and Pharaoh's inhuman order to drown Israelite male babies.

Now, as then, the use of force against violent aggressors and oppressors is sometimes a necessary evil for achieving freedom, justice and insuring human rights. In 1948 and1967, if Israelis did not fight for their freedom, we would not be here. And today, we need only to look across our borders, particularly at Syria, to observe the violent "state of nature" in full force.

Jewish tradition, despite the emphasis on caring for the needy, orphans and other weak members of society, does not seek to run away from these political realities. Indeed, the Passover story and the commandment to teach it to our children in every generation are reminders that in political terms, little has changed in 4,000 years.

Syrian civil war turns spotlight on Golan

Israel is preparing for the possibility that major changes are likely to occur in Syria, its bitterly hostile northern neighbour, in the not-too-distant future.

With a civil war consuming Syria, a country "falling apart in front of our eyes," as Israel's former defence minister, Ehud Barak, put it, Israel can hardly be certain of what lies ahead.

Not too long ago, the Golan Heights – captured by Israel during the Six Day War in 1967 and formally annexed in 1981 – were remarkably tranquil. But in the past two years, as peaceful protests in Syria have degenerated into fierce fighting pitting the Syrian government of President Bashar Assad against a diverse collection of Syrian rebels backed by western powers and Middle Eastern nations such as Qatar, Turkey and Saudi Arabia, tensions have flared on the Golan, which has been patrolled by the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force, or UNDOF, since the Yom Kippur War in 1973.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

In May 2011, shortly after the eruption of the uprising in Syria, the Syrian regime, in a crude attempt to divert attention away from its mounting internal problems, encouraged Palestinians living in Syria to test Israel's resolve. About 100 Palestinians breached an Israeli security fence along the border and reached the Druze town of Majdal Shams before being arrested or shot.

More recently, as Syrian villages and a military intelligence facility in the demilitarized zones have been seized by the rebels, the war has spilled perilously close to or into Israeli territory on the Golan, which is populated by 20,000 Jewish settlers and an equal number of Druze, some of whom have taken Israeli citizenship. Since the waning months of 2012, stray Syrian bullets, mortars and tank shells have landed harmlessly near Israeli settlements and military outposts. In one case, an Israeli soldier was injured by an errant bullet, prompting Israel to launch a retaliatory missile strike on a Syrian army encampment.

After the latest incident on March 5, in which three mortars crashed into an empty field adjacent to the moshav of Ramat Magshimim, in the deepest penetration of Syrian fire into Israeli territory in years, Israel's ambassador to the United Nations, Ron Prosor, warned the UN Security Council that its patience was wearing thin and that further violations of the truce, signed by Israel and Syria in 1974, would not be tolerated.

Shortly after Prosor delivered this warning, a group of UNDOF peacekeepers, all Filipino nationals, were kidnapped by Syria rebels, in the first incident of its kind in nearly 40 years. The 21 Filipinos were eventually released, but the abduction prompted commentators to wonder whether it would undermine the UN mission on the Golan, which has played a role in stabilizing the peace.

On a much broader and deeper level, two major concerns preoccupy Israel as Syria descends further into chaos.

Much like in Libya, one of the Arab countries whose autocratic leadership was toppled by the rebellions of the Arab Spring, Islamic fundamentalists from all corners of the Muslim world have poured into Syria to combat the Syrian regime.

Israel, the United States and the European Union fear that Islamists, having hijacked revolts in Egypt and Tunisia, may emerge triumphant in Syria as well.

It goes without saying that an Islamist regime in Syria would be as hostile to Israel as Assad's secular nationalist regime. In recent weeks, Syria, which has fought four wars and numerous skirmishes with Israel since 1948, has accused Israel of arming the rebels in collusion with neighbouring nations – Qatar, Saudi Arabia and Turkey – and reportedly shot down an Israeli drone close to Syria's border with Lebanon.

The rebels, be they Islamists or secularists, are belligerent toward Israel, notwithstanding the fact that the Israeli government recently admitted seven of their wounded fighters for medical treatment in a hospital in Safed.

The Free Syrian Army, which has borne much of the burden of the rebel offensive against Assad's regime, has accused Israel of tacitly backing Assad. The accusation is implausible, particularly in light of Israel's recent air strike on a Syrian military research institute and its bombing of a North Korean designed nuclear reactor in Syria in 2007.

Still more serious, the newly installed leader of the rebel coalition, Mouaz al-Khatib, has described Zionism as a "cancerous movement." It is true that his comment appeared in an essay six years ago, long before the revolt broke out in Syria. Nonetheless, Khatib's malicious view of Zionism doubtless remains unchanged and reveals an anti-Israel mindset shared equally by the rebels and the Syrian regime.

Apart from the concern that post-Assad Syria could be an incredibly destabilizing force in the region, Israel has expressed fears that Syria's stocks of chemical weapons may fall into the hands of Assad's loyal ally, Hezbollah, which fought a war with Israel in 2006 and has vigorously thrown its support behind the Syrian regime in both political and military terms.

Israel does not appear to believe that Syria's chemical weapons pose a clear and present danger, as Moshe Ya'alon, the minister of defence, and Gen. Benny Gantz, the chief of staff, have said in assessing Syrian intentions.

But Israel is taking no chances, having upgraded its forces on the Golan and announced that a five-metre-high border fence is currently being built along the 100-kilometre length of the ceasefire line with Syria, and that a third Iron Dome anti-missile battery has been deployed as a precautionary measure in the Galilee.

Under the current circumstances, Israel will hew to the status quo on the Golan, a strategic region rich in water resources. Last October, the Israeli daily Yediot Achronot published a report claiming that Israel had agreed in principle to withdraw from the Golan after having conducted secret indirect talks with Syria in 2010. The report, based on documents written by U.S. diplomat Frederick Hoff, suggested that Israel would pull back to the shores of the Sea of Galilee, the pre-1967 border, in exchange for a peace treaty with Syria.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's office immediately denied the report, and the then foreign minister, Avigdor Lieberman, declared that the Golan would remain in Israeli hands. "The Golan Heights," he said, "are like Tel Aviv."

So much for the notion that the Golan is up for grabs. Israel will not negotiate with a regime whose days are numbered.

Why settlers won't drive the coalition bus

In the March 11 Ha'aretz, editor-in-chief Aluf Benn wrote a column on the formation of the new Israeli government that appeared to be a declaration of outrage rather than the careful analysis for which he is well respected. "Now the game has ended and real life will begin. The third Netanyahu government has one clear goal: enlarging the settlements and achieving the vision of 'a million Jews living in Judea and Samaria.' This magic number will thwart the division of the land and prevent once and for all the establishment of a Palestinian state."

In subsequent days, others at Ha'aretz echoed a similar line. A number of western journalists who frequently look to Ha'aretz as a major source of analysis of Israeli government policy reflected the same position.

To put Israel's new government in perspective, According To Reports spoke to veteran Mideast analyst Jim Lederman.

ATR: Is it fair to say that Israel's new government will be promoting the settlers' agenda, as some in the media have reported?

JL: The media are behaving like sportscasters. They assume that the higher the numbers, the stronger a team is. This has encouraged the already triumphalist settlers to believe that they have seized control of the government's agenda. That is rubbish. It is as though nobody has read Moneyball. Translating baseball strategizing to Israel politics, it's not the number of ministers you have, but which portfolios they control.

ATR: How can you be confident that the pundits are so wrong?

JL: It's obvious. The pundits fail to take into account that the other coalition partners and the opposition have in effect created a new approach to Israeli governance, something that Netanyahu did not anticipate and that the pundits still don't understand.

ATR: New approach?

JR: This change has included adopting a new system of checks and balances. Labor, for the first time, is acting like a real, forceful opposition party, instead of begging to be included in the coalition.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Israeli politicians have always rejected adopting a set of constitutional checks and balances, believing that everything should be negotiable. In practice, in the past, this approach led to coalition agreements that divided power among sectoral interests. This time, though, the parties have aimed not just at getting power, but also at getting cabinet positions that will enable them to prevent the other coalition partners from acquiring unrestricted power for themselves.

ATR: But don't the more centre/centre-left members have fewer cabinet positions?

JL: Even though they now have fewer ministers and deputy ministers, the non-Likud coalition members were able to negotiate control over those ministries that will affect the other coalition partners' demands and plans. For example, Justice Minister Tzipi Livni is now in a position to halt or delay any legislation affecting the settlements, while Finance Minister Yair Lapid is in almost total control of the settlers' access to government funding.

ATR: Are there other factors to bear in mind about how the government will set its priorities?

JL: Definitely. The government had a budget deficit of 40 billion shekels last year and will probably have a deficit of 50 billion shekels this year. There are going to have to be massive spending cuts – including the budgets for the settlements. The settlers will be unable to claim that spending more on settlements is an urgent national priority. And maybe most of all, Habayit Hayehudi's leader Naftali Bennett believes he can attract the support of "traditional Jews" living within the green line and not just Orthodox settlers and their supporters. But to do so, his party is going to have support spending legislation designed to cope with the social and economic issues that led the Israeli middle class to take to the streets almost two years ago. There is no way that he can do that and also support increased spending on settlements.

Lederman's insightful analysis offers important nuance to a public conversation that is all too often simplistic and one-dimensional.

Record growth at Sutton Group Admiral: "if you build it, they will come"

Murray and Sol Goldkind had a vision: a state-of-the-art home selling environment in an environment that felt like... well, home.

How novel.

"When we brainstormed about the type of facility in which to accommodate the growth of our sales force, the one thing we kept coming back to is that the new home for our agents and brokers should be more than just another four-wall office environment," says Broker of Record Murray Goldkind. "It occurred to us that most of the new real estate offices being built to sell more homes don't feel like home themselves."

Muray Goldkind
Broker of Record

"A great salesperson will be successful regardless of his or her surroundings," says Sol, "but creating an office environment that feels like home puts everyone in a home-selling frame of mind."

A growing number of talented agents and brokers agree. The spike in Sutton Group Admiral's growth curve since the opening of the new Centre Street office attests to the fact that "if you build it, they will come." In recent months, Sutton Group Admiral has welcomed aboard numerous industry stalwarts such as Andrea Halpern, Essie Sher, Eleanor James and Daniel Fisherman.

Andrea Halpern
Sales Representative

Halpern, formerly of Remax Realtron, has settled into her new digs without skipping a beat.

Except she doesn't settle.

"Never" says Halpern. "My customers don't settle for less than the best, nor do I. Sutton Group Admiral provides a level of technical and administrative support that allows me to maintain a singular focus on my customers' needs. As a salesperson, I can't ask for anything more."

This eye-on-the-prize philosophy is nothing new at Sutton Group Admiral. "It's always been about the customers," says Murray. "Their needs come first."

Serving those needs means getting sellers the best return on their property and buyers the best value.

"Our people can only do that if all of their energies are directed towards facilitating transactions," says Murray. You can't operate at a productive clip if you're looking for paper clips."

"Since Day One," says Sol, "we have always asked ourselves, "How can we be better tomorrow than we are today? In this business, if you're not two steps ahead of the game, you're behind it."

Evelyn James
Sales Representative

"Two steps ahead" might understate the innovations at the new Centre Street facility. Its 15,000 square feet of state-of-the-art office space houses the kind of cutting-edge services and facilities that Admiral agents need to further enhance the top-drawer service they give their clients.

This is the Sutton Group Admiral formula in action: maximizing opportunity and minimizing hassle for its agents and brokers.

The record-breaking sales achieved by its ever-growing team — now over 250 agents and brokers — has allowed Sutton Group Admiral to not only consolidate its niche atop the residential resale market, but also to further its presence in the highly competitive field of new home construction sales.

Murray prides himself on his ability to read and respond to the needs of home buyers and sellers: "Today's home buyers are looking for one thing: VALUE. The agents and brokers who give them maximum value for their hard-earned dollars will earn their business. Those who don't, won't."

Sol Goldkind
Sales Representative

In its dual capacity as reseller and new home purveyor, Sutton Group Admiral's access to both resale homes and new construction allows it to offer home buyers the best of both worlds, says Sol. "Whether you're looking for a resale home or a new one, you can now explore ALL your interests and options with us."

One thing that hasn't changed, says Sol, is Sutton Group Admiral's commitment to work "24 hours a day to earn your trust and ensure your satisfaction."

Essie Sher
Sales Representative

The 250 + agents and brokers of Sutton Group Admiral Realty wish you a Happy, Healthy & Peaceful Passover

Ancient synagogue mosaics portray Samson

Sheldon Kirshner

High-quality mosaics adorning the floor of an ancient synagogue in the Galilee have been found by archeologists representing a consortium of six North American universities, including the University of Toronto.

The 1,600-year-old mosaics, some of which depict biblical scenes, were described as "spectacular" by the lead archeologist, Jodi Magness, in a recent interview.

Magness, a professor of early Judaism at the University of North Carolina, was in Toronto in mid-March to deliver a lecture on the excavation.

The synagogue, from the Roman-Byzantine period, was uncovered on the site of Yaquq, an Arab village near the Sea of Galilee whose residents fled during the first Arab-Israeli war in 1948.

The site was then taken over by the Israeli army and used as a training base. The ruins of the village were bulldozed in 1968.

Yaquq was also populated by Canaanites, Romans and Jews, being known as Hucuca during the Roman era and as Huqoq by Jews.

In addition to uncovering a synagogue, Magness and her colleagues dug up a ritual bath.

The remnants of dozens of ancient synagogue buildings have been uncovered in Israel and Jordan in the past few decades, said Magness.

Jodi Magness

What is unusual about Huqoq are the biblical mosaics. Only a very small number of late Roman synagogues decorated with such mosaics have been excavated, she added.

The dig in Huqoq, begun in 2011, is expected to be finished in 2016.

The mosaics will either be removed from the site and exhibited in a museum, or be left there within a new national park.

She hopes that the authorities choose the second option.

Apart from the University of Toronto, members of the consortium are the University of North Carolina, Brigham Young University, Trinity University, the University of Oklahoma and the University of Wyoming.

The University of Toronto team is under the direction of the Archeology Centre and the Centre for Jewish Studies.

Calling the synagogue building "monumental," Magness saved much of her enthusiasm for the fourth to sixth century CE mosaics.

They portray a dedicatory inscription in either Hebrew or Aramaic, two female figures with lotus flowers in their hair who may well have been synagogue donors and the figure of Samson taking revenge on the Philistines.

"He has a thick red belt around his waist, and is dressed like a Roman soldier," said Magness, who appeared at the interview with Michael Chazan, the director of U of T's Archeology Centre.

Samson, the biblical figure, as portrayed in an ancient synagogue mosaic found in the Galilee.

Samson was a local hero

Portrayals of Samson in synagogue mosaics are quite unusual, she pointed out. But in Huqoq, he was clearly seen as both "a local hero" and a "shield of Israel."

In rabbinic sources, however, Samson is negatively regarded because he lusted after non-Israelite women, she noted.

During the Roman-Byzantine period, most of the inhabitants of Palestine were Christians, Romans and pagans. The majority of Jews living in villages in the eastern Galilee and on the Golan Heights were farmers. She does not know how many Jews lived in Palestine during that time.

And while she is not certain how many more ancient synagogues in the Galilee may be found in the future, she said that German archeologists working near by are also in the midst of excavating a synagogue.

Prior to Huqoq, Magness was involved in excavating the Roman siege works in Masada. "No one had ever done it," she said.

She also worked in two other sites.

She excavated a late Roman fortress in Yotvata – the present site of a kibbutz in the Arava desert – and dug up the remains of two churches in the former Christian village of Khirbet Yattir, near Hebron.

Magness does not believe in using archeology for political ends.

"I have no political agenda," she said. "People who do so misuse archeology. I'm a scientist, not a politician."

Arts funding a 'hard-hit area'

CowJews and Indians* opens this year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival

"There are a lot of charities and non-profits asking people for support. We're not saving lives or curing diseases, but what we are trying to remind people to do is remember the importance of arts and culture, and of protecting this heritage of the Jewish experience through the years around the world that's been amassed on film," she said.

Werner noted that funding for the arts over the last few years has been "a hard-hit area."

Longstanding funders such as UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and other private donors have given less as the economy has forced cutbacks across the board, she said.

The archives project is in the "development phase," Werner said.

New U of T president son of Holocaust survivor

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The new president of the University of Toronto is the son of a Holocaust survivor.

Meric Gertler, whose appointment was announced in early March, will be the school's 16th president in its nearly 200 years of existence. He will succeed incumbent David Naylor later this year.

Gertler, who joined U of T 30 years ago, is a professor of geography and planning. He holds the Goldring Chair in Canadian Studies at University College and is currently dean of the faculty of arts and sciences, a position he has held since December 2008. Prior to this, he was vice-dean of graduate education and research.

Gertler's father, Leonard, an urban planner, was the founding director of the University of Waterloo's School of Planning.

His mother, born in what was then Czechoslovakia, survived the Holocaust. Gertler declined to provide her name or details of her experiences during the Nazi occupation.

Born in Edmonton, Gertler grew up mostly in Toronto and Waterloo and spent periods of time in St. Catharines and Ottawa.

He earned an undergraduate degree at McMaster University and a post-graduate degree in city planning at the University of California, Berkeley. He received a PhD from Harvard University, writing his thesis on "Capital Dynamics and Regional Development."

In an interview, Gertler said his Montreal-born father, who headed a major study that led to the establishment of the Niagara Escarpment Planning Commission, kindled his fascination with cities. As he put it, "The talk at the dinner table revolved around cities and urban issues for as long as I can remember."

He added, "Today, with such a large and growing proportion of the world's population living in cities, and with city regions emerging as the most important sites of innovation, creativity and entrepreneurship, my interest in the economic dynamism of cities is very timely. So, too, is my fascination with the relationship between the university and the city around it – an interest I am now able to pursue from both a scholarly and a practical perspective."

Meric Gertler

As dean of arts and sciences, Gertler redesigned the structure of undergraduate education to emphasize "core competencies" such as writing, critical thinking and quantitative reasoning.

He also increased enrolment in doctoral programs by roughly 50 per cent and created a series of new graduate programs.

"One example I am especially proud of is the Centre for Jewish Studies, which has continued to develop and thrive in recent years, attracting large numbers of undergraduate and graduate students to its courses, and putting in place a vibrant new master's program to complement its PhD program," he said.

Gertler described the Centre for Jewish Studies, directed by Jeffrey Kopstein, as "a truly dynamic interdisciplinary centre" that promotes the study of Jewish thought, philosophy, history, culture and classical Judaism.

Gertler made a surprise appearance at the centre on Feb. 25, talking in general terms about U of T.

He was introduced by Kopstein, whose featured speaker, Trinity College professor Samuel Kassow, delivered a lecture on the Warsaw ghetto historian Emanuel Ringelblum.

Almost two years ago, Gertler went to Israel to deliver the Arie Shachar memorial lecture and seminar on urban studies at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. After the lecture, he co-hosted an alumni reception at which several members of U of T's faculty were present.

Israel's success in start-up technology makes it an example to emulate as U of T's Munk School of Global Affairs develops its new Innovation Policy Lab, Gertler said.

"The emergence of the 'start-up nation' phenomenon in Israel makes it a natural case study for this kind of work, alongside other standout cases such as India, Brazil, China and others," he observed.

"In this context, our strong partnerships with the leading universities in Israel, as well as other top universities around the world, will be a major asset."

He intends to "hit the ground running" when he takes over from Naylor.

"I have worked at U of T for my entire academic career and have spent the last eight years in senior academic administration," noted Gertler, whose research has attracted $8.4 million in external funding. "This has given me a very detailed knowledge of how U of T works. And I have strong working relationships with many colleagues across the university."

Students bring cheer to retirement home

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

Coby Segall says, "Let's go everybody," as he runs around the room, dancing to the tune of Am Yisrael Chai playing in the background.

He stops to hold a guest's hand and begins jumping up and down with his hands in hers, as she smiles back at him from her wheelchair.

Segall is dancing and singing with a group of students and the residents of Cummer Lodge, a long-term care home in Toronto. "I try to inject spirituality into their lives," he said, at the Purim-themed event earlier this month. "I'm reminding them what it feels like to feel joy."

Ronny Segall plays piano to Cummer Lodge residents.

Segall has been running monthly Jewish-themed programs at Cummer Lodge for almost nine years. It all started by accident, he said. In 2004, the rabbi who used to run Shabbat services at Cummer Lodge was away for a few months, and so Segall, newly observant, decided to lead the program. After the rabbi returned, he asked, "What can we do to keep this going?" That's when Segall decided to commit one Sunday morning a month to Cummer Lodge.

Since then, he's gathered a team of about 15 volunteers – high school and university students and young professionals – who wake up at 8 a.m. on a Sunday and head to Cummer Lodge. It takes them two hours to go to the different residents' rooms and ask if they're interested in coming downstairs for the program. Usually, about 60 residents will join. Then, he places all their wheelchairs in a large circle, so he can see everyone. The music starts playing, and Segall and his team of volunteers start interacting with each resident.

At first, many don't want to stand up or even hold hands with the volunteers. But after a few songs, and after Segall has broken into a wide smile and has danced with many of the residents, the mood shifts. The residents smile, waiting for their turn to dance with a volunteer. One man who was moving his wheelchair back and forth in the corner, to the tune of the music, suddenly moves to the centre of the room, his lips mouthing the words of the song. Toward the end, one resident stands up and says, "This cheers me up. Thank you."

He's not the only one to feel that way. Sylvia Marsch has been living at Cummer Lodge for four years. She said she loves coming to the program because she gets a chance to interact with other people.

"I'm alone, and I like to be with people and share my thoughts," said Marsch, 90. "I like the things [the volunteers] are doing. They're helping people."

For these residents, it's a chance to feel like someone cares. "We're empowering them, and bridging the generation gap," said Segall. "There's so much learning that we can do from the people that are here."

One of these people is David Jacobs, a Holocaust survivor who says he was liberated by then U.S. president Dwight Eisenhower. He attends the programs with his wife. He came to Canada in 1948. "I was a tailor," said Jacobs, who will turn 95 in July. "They [Canada] started to take people in. They needed tailors." At one of the programs a few months ago, he brought pictures of him and his family, and other artifacts from the Holocaust to show the other residents. "I like it here. They know me."

The volunteers end up forming a relationship with the residents so it can be hard to let go. "Sometimes people pass away. You miss people. You know their face. Then they're not here, they're gone," said volunteer Eldad Ben Hamo.

The impact the program has on the volunteers is clear. "Seeing where life can take you, you go from dependence on parents to dependence on children," said Julia Segal, another volunteer. "It puts all those trivial disagreements in your own family into perspective."

Notes from an aliyah pilot trip

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to the CJN

Our recent trip to Israel was like no vacation ever: a "pilot trip" for our planned aliyah this summer. Just my husband and I – no kids, and a jam-packed agenda of 11 cities in 12 days.

Half the cities were in the central part of the country and half in the north, where there's a push to resettle immigrants and native Israelis. Not all were contenders, like Jerusalem, with its high cost of living and scarce jobs.

Our story probably isn't typical: many olim know where they're heading, near family or friends, or areas popular with other Anglos (if you speak English, you're an Anglo). "We'll know it when we see it," I said of our future hometown. I hoped so, since even our "short list" was dauntingly long.

The plan was to get around on buses, cabs and trains, because that's how we hope to live, given that new cars are taxed at 100 per cent and gas prices can triple those here (who does Israel even buy gas from?).

Based in a funky hostel in central Jerusalem, we scooted around the centre of the country that first week, soaking in what each place had to offer.

After an obligatory Kotel visit the first night, we hit the ground running: hopping a bus next morning to Ramat Beit Shemesh, sometimes dubbed "Thornhill East" for its many English speakers.

Teddy and and Jennifer MacLeod seen overlooking the city of Karmiel

Surprises awaited us everywhere: Hebrew is essential even in Beit Shemesh; Ma'aleh Adumim is a city, not a "settlement"; the Weizmann Institute particle accelerator is a "geek-cool" highlight of any tour of Rehovot – which also has a great mall and an authentic shuk across the street.

Great malls can be found everywhere!

Actually, we found great malls everywhere – each with its own Aroma Espresso Bar and kosher bakery. This would be a tough decision.

Shabbat might have been a restful break, but we decided the hilly streets of Jerusalem's Har Nof would be most scenic. Six flights of stairs down from our hosts' home at the very top of the city, we reached the fir trees that surround the neighbourhood and gazed down at picturesque hillsides dotted with red kalaniyot (poppy anemones) in bloom – then sighed and began the shlep back up.

On Sunday – an ordinary workday in Israel – we wound northward by train to join a group pilot trip with Nefesh B'Nefesh, an organization that works with the Jewish Agency to promote aliyah.

In a small land, with hostile neighbours, going north can be unsettling. We were headed for Nahariya, a seaside resort about 10 minutes from the Lebanon border. Still, on a Sunday night in February, it was heady to gaze from our hotel room over a perfect Mediterranean sunset.

Outside Karmiel City Hall: closer to Lebanon than Jerusalem.

Joining the group, we went from lone rangers, boldly navigating bus fares and street signs, to a dry-land "cruise ship" – all-you-can-eat kosher buffet, head counts, name badges and the ongoing spiel of "on our left, we're passing…" Everybody said we were lucky to see the Kinneret (Sea of Galilee) almost full after a rainy winter – but coming from Lake Ontario, I couldn't exactly ooh and ahh, no matter how much I knew this was "very good for Israel."

All 36 of us (from the United States and Canada) are planning aliyah soon. Beyond that, we were a mixed bag: religious and non-religious; born Jews; converts; non-Jewish spouses; young married couples and retirees.

Beyond some scenic lookouts, our no-nonsense tours included apartments, industrial parks and clinics. We visited two city halls and saw countless playgrounds, schools, malls and kupat cholim (health care plan) offices.

Everywhere, we met locals – recent olim living in the north. Due to the limitations of cramming in 36-plus visitors, we mainly saw how the comfortable half lives (I wasn't alone in wondering how their homes compared to what we could actually afford). They all had great things to say, but our hosts were also very honest about adjusting to a language and to a culture with which we may share common roots, but which is way different from what they were used to.

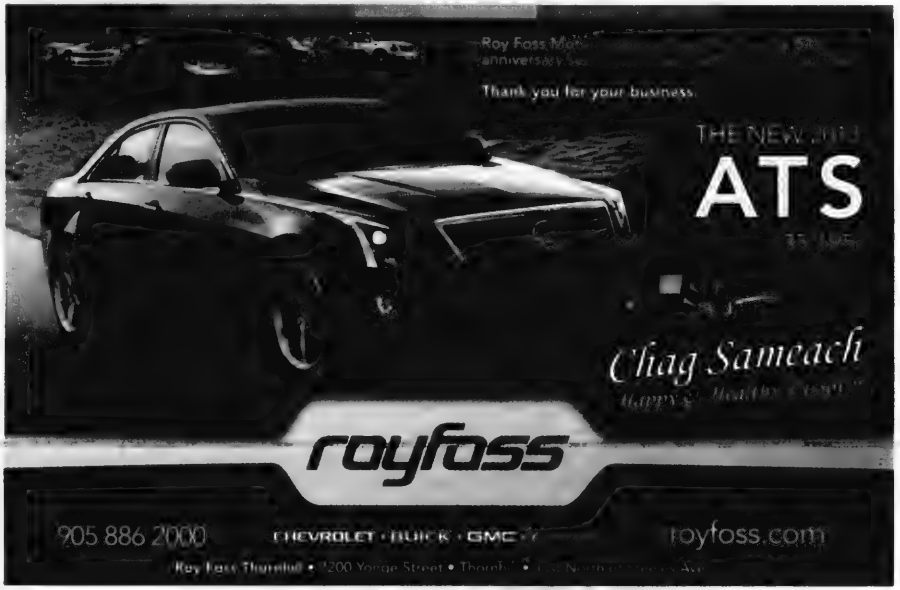
Between tours, we worked hard, aided by delicious local citrus to keep our strength up, through workshops on real estate, employment, shipping, education and health care – all in three days!

Our last night, my husband and I each made a secret list, ranking every city we'd seen: B'nei Brak, Har Nof, Jerusalem, Karmiel, Kfar Vradim, Ma'aleh Adumim, Ma'alot, Nahariya, Raanana, Rehovot, Rosh Pina and Tzefat. A few dropped to the bottom immediately, but shuffling the Top 5 was tough. Every city had something wonderful to offer.

Then we swapped lists, and through a process I still don't understand, eliminated every choice but one: Karmiel, in the north, with its balance of green space, city feel, affordable living, mixed religious community, culture, shopping and car-free transportation options.

Is Karmiel (the "K" and I differentiate it from the better-known Carmel) the only place with these things? Nope. But while some people take more than one pilot trip to choose among many good choices, we want to get on with the business of actually living in Israel.

Heading out, with time to kill, we stopped for supper in Tel Aviv, adding a lucky 13th city to the itinerary. Dinner was so awesome it took a real effort to get back on the train and catch our flight. But coming back to Toronto felt OK, not bittersweet at all. We have a job to do – it's time to pack up and move on. And somewhere out there, our next home is waiting.



Happy and Healthy Passover

This year marks the end of our family's 17-year journey with Jewish day schools in Toronto, as our youngest daughter is about to graduate from TanenbaumCHAT. For many Jewish families, sending their kids to Jewish day schools is a natural part of Jewish life in the Diaspora. However, this is not the case for many Israelis who live abroad. Generally, Israelis (especially non-observant/secular) have a hard time understanding the concept of Jewish community life in the Diaspora, and accepting the need to make the efforts and monetary sacrifices to preserve their Jewish identity and culture. This includes sending their kids to private Jewish schools, belonging to a synagogue and supporting the Jewish community and its institutions. Living in a Jewish state 'releases' Israelis from the need to be 'active' Jews; thus being Jewish is taken for granted and, to some extent, loses its meaning.

Therefore, as non-observant Israelis who want to maintain a Jewish identity in the Diaspora, we need to understand and recognize that while our Jewish identity is mostly premised on our connection to the State of Israel, the Hebrew language and contemporary Israeli culture, it lacks a substantive connection to the rich and diverse Jewish heritage and culture that developed over thousands of years prior to the modern State of Israel, and continues to develop to this date. We also need to understand that developing a stronger Jewish identity is not only important to building bridges to the local Jewish community, but is also essential to maintaining our connection and our kids' connection to the State of Israel.

The maintenance and nurturing of the two identities (Israeli and Jewish) for us and for our kids is challenging for Israeli parents in the Diaspora, but can be an extremely rewarding process that leads to a win-win situation. On one hand, strengthening the Israeli identity and pride of our kids is crucial in maintaining a common ground for parents with their kids through a common culture. Even more so, our children's connection with the amazing story and history of the State of Israel, Zionism and the Hebrew language, are a huge source of pride and richness, and are vital in the development of their identity as Jews, Israelis, and human beings.

On the other hand, supporting the development of the kids of former Israelis' Jewish identity will give them a good chance in integrating into, and belonging to, the local Jewish community. Given the lack of strong Jewish identity among secular Israelis, attending Jewish schools may even be more critical for their kids than it is for the kids of Jewish Canadian parents. Attending Jewish schools is the key to ensuring that kids of former Israeli in the Diaspora will not only grow up to be proud Jews/Israelis, but also, given their Israeli background, these kids could be well positioned to act as leaders in the community, and play a crucial role in building bridges between Israelis and Diaspora Jews, by bringing different perspectives of Israel to the Diaspora, and vice versa.

In appreciation and gratitude to the Jewish day schools' priceless contribution to the Jewish identity and pride of my two daughters over the last 17 years, I would like to share my perspective on the key benefits of sending kids to Jewish schools, from a point of view of Israeli non-observant secular parents:

1. Reducing the gap between emigrant parents and their children:

The generation gap between parents and their children may be larger among families of immigrants. Children who are raised in a different country/culture from that of their parents may develop a different set of values from those held by their parents. Jewish schools help to bridge this gap by providing values and contents that are more familiar to Israeli parents and possibly their kids, than the ones provided in public schools. This includes Jewish heritage, love of Israel, the Hebrew language, and Zionism.

2. Reconnecting with Jewish content/values: Israeli students (from secular background) have an opportunity to gain important knowledge of Judaism, reconnect with the traditional Jewish roots and values of justice, modesty, peace, democracy, ethics, love of learning, tikkun olam, tzedakah and family values. This learning is essential in the development of strong Jewish identity and pride.

An Israeli-Canadian perspective

3. Facilitating easier integration: The immersion in the Jewish school system helps Israeli students integrate into the local Jewish community. Children learn the Jewish community 'way of life', the mentality and concept of community building that can be foreign to Israelis. They connect with local Jewish kids and build relationships for life. The exposure to Jewish schools also helps Israeli parents learn about Jewish life in the Diaspora and supports easier integration.

4. Supporting leadership: Studying in a Jewish school, where the Hebrew language and the connection to Israel are central, gives Israeli kids an advantage and a great tool they can use to enrich and support their peers as well as take leadership roles.

5. Acting as ambassadors for Israel: With their knowledge of Hebrew and special connection to Israel, Israeli kids many times are the best ambassadors for Israel. They can bring a different perspective of Judaism to schools in the Diaspora that can strengthen, for non-Israeli kids, the understanding and pride in Israel, the appreciation of the Hebrew language and connection to different aspects of Judaism. This special and important role that Israelis kids can play in the life of the community is an immense source of satisfaction for these kids.

6. Educating to excellence: Jewish schools provide their students with key Jewish values, such as diligence, desire to learn and drive for accomplishment and excellence. In Jewish schools it is 'cool' to excel academically. For example, it is known that graduates of CHAT have superior study habits, which are most beneficial when they move on to university.

7. Jewish ambiance ('Ruach'): The Jewish warm ambience is a central part of many Jewish schools. Jewish values of respect and mutual help, decency and integrity are central to the culture and experience.

The Israeli emigrant population in the Toronto GTA has been growing steadily over the last few decades, reaching approximately 50,000, by some accounts, or approximately 25 per cent of the local Jewish population. As they become more established in the community, Israelis understand that Jewish schools do not necessarily mean religious/Orthodox but can be more pluralistic and tolerant. They recognize the relevance of Jewish education and its vital importance in Jewish continuity, and accept the reality and need to pay for Jewish education when outside Israel. As a result, students from Israeli homes are becoming more visible in Jewish schools. At TanenbaumCHAT (one of the largest and most well-respected Jewish high school in North America), over the past 10 years, there has been a considerable increase in the number of students coming from Israeli homes. Elementary day schools, such as Associated Hebrew Schools, Leo Baeck Day School, Bialik Hebrew Day School and Robbins Hebrew Academy, have also seen upward trends in attendance of students from Israeli homes in recent years.

Other Jewish educational options, such as Jewish/Israeli supplementary schools, have experienced meteoric growth in recent years demonstrating the unfulfilled pent-up demand that existed in the community prior to their opening. Kachol Lavan, the Centre for Hebrew and Israel Studies, was founded in 2006, and offers Sunday classes to Israeli and non-Israeli kids, on Hebrew, Israeli culture and Jewish heritage. The number of students at Kachol Lavan has grown from 80 students in 2006/07 to 400 in 2012/13 (400 per cent increase in six years).

In spite of the recent positive trends of increased participation in Jewish/Israeli education, the majority of Israeli parents choose to send their kids to public schools and do not send their kids to Jewish/Israeli day schools or Sunday schools, for numerous reasons. These include, but are not limited to, financial reasons, other priorities, misperceptions and resentment towards Diaspora mentality, or because they believe that their kids will stay Jewish given that they speak Hebrew at home.

Jewish education is a cornerstone in maintaining the Jewish identity. This applies even more so to secular Israeli Canadians than to local Jews, as secular Israelis' connection to Jewish institutions, is relatively weak. Full integration of Israelis into the Jewish community cannot be achieved without going through the Jewish education system.

Sara Dobner is a member of the board of directors, TanenbaumCHAT, a member of the advisory board of Kachol Lavan, and the chair of the Israeli identity program, Hamifgash Program, Schwartz/Reisman Centre, UJA Federation.

Is IAW still relevant?

For many in our community, it must have been enormously reassuring to read that, according to an "analysis" by Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, "[Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW)] is a non-event, in general media terms" (CJN, March 10). In the same article, it's reported that this epiphany apparently mirrors "monitoring" of IAW activities by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA). We're informed about how "CIJA always considers [their] strategic advocacy efforts through the lens of [their] target audiences." Accordingly, CIJA explains that "as a starting point, this means understanding that most students and faculty members devote very little (if any) consideration to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict."

This notion is a little difficult to digest. As we're only too painfully aware, the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is featured in the news almost every day, so students and faculty, regardless of the apparent cloistering that CIJA seems to attribute to them, undoubtedly participate in, and often take the lead in, much of the discourse that's relevant to the conflict.

And while accepting that the results of CIJA's "monitoring" may have application to some campuses (usually those in Toronto, Montreal or Ottawa), the overall assertions do not necessarily reflect IAW experiences at many other centres across Canada.

Also, CIJA's apparent attempts to downplay the impact of the anti-Israel demonstrations at our universities, and its frequent discouragement of grassroots initiatives to actively counter them, convey an unmistakable message of insensitivity and lack of support to those in our community who've decided, because of the special needs of their particular campuses, to assert themselves in ways that might not conform with what's widely seen as the top-down, cookbook, approach that the CIJA leadership tries constantly to impose.

My View

Lawrence Hart

Ironically, though, there may be a kernel of insight into the assertion that IAW has become "a non-event." What we're now needing to confront is not just the pernicious problem of this one week designated as IAW, but something that's far more pervasive.

This relates to the particular terminology that underpins the international campaign to demonize, delegitimize, and ultimately destroy the State of Israel, which has – in no small part as a result of IAW – become firmly entrenched in our day-to-day, year-round conversations on campus. The term "Israeli apartheid" is heard all the time, as though it were fact rather than odious fiction.

Moreover, since IAW first embedded itself in the academic calendar in 2005 – at the University of Toronto – tens of thousands of graduating students have already been subjected to its vocabulary. As a consequence, it's likely that many will leave the academy with a certain modicum of suspicion that Israel is responsible for at least some – perhaps much – of the turmoil that it's blamed for. This will be the true legacy of IAW, long after the week itself has given way to the next fad that serves to galvanize Israel-haters on our campuses.

The obvious time to have eradicated the tumour was at its source nine years ago, but even then, the overriding view of segments of our organized Jewish community was that IAW did not merit serious attention. As could easily have been predicted, we've paid a high price for such inertia.

Goodbye Passover, hello Mimouna

Even if your family hails from Plonsk, Pinsk or Minsk, imagine they come from Tangiers, Fez or Marrakesh: That way you can take part in the Jewish Moroccan holiday of Mimouna. Right after Passover ends, those Jews usher in a celebration of liberty, community values, friendship and hospitality.

Mimouna has a connection to the final day of Passover when the Israelites finally reached the Red Sea. Many of the day's traditions reflect that connection such as going to the beach and putting (sometimes live) fish on the table in remembrance of the splitting of the sea. [http://bit.ly/mimouna1]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

In marked contrast with the seder night, when congregants hurried home from the synagogue to begin the Haggadah, congregants on the eve of Mimouna take the time to wish each other: tarbah (success), the special Mimouna blessing: Alallah Mimouna, Ambarka mas'uda, and to enjoy some mahya, a honey-based drink. [http://bit.ly/mimouna2]

"Some believe that Mimouna represents a symbolic new beginning of freedom from slavery, and so sweets are set out on a table with a white tablecloth decorated with flowers and wheat sheaves which is the centerpiece of the Mimouna Day. In the sense of Mimouna being a new beginning, eating these sweets symbolizes a sweet year." [http://bit.ly/mimouna3]

What about the name "Mimouna?" It may allude to the word emunah, faith. Perhaps the celebration can be traced to the anniversary of the death of Maimon Ben Joseph of Fez, the father of Maimonides. [http://bit.ly/mimouna4]

Not so fast, says Yigal Bin-Nun. The holiday's Moroccan origins are actually pagan, "a feast day designed to appease a local she-devil, and contained no religious components. In Israel, however, its pagan origins have been ignored." Bin-Nun adds that "there is nothing to keep future generations from investing old holidays with new-old meaning. Particularly worthy of note is that over the generations, Mimouna eve became a night for young people and lovers, as well as a symbol of Jewish-Muslim solidarity. Because the Jews could not keep chametz in their homes during the Passover holiday, it was customary to give all their flour, yeast and grain to their Muslim neighbors." [http://bit.ly/mimouna5]

Regardless of its origins, the preferable way to spend the day is at family picnics. What to pack? Daniel Rogov provides a recipe for mofleta (or moufletta) which is the first leavened bread eaten after the Passover holiday and for a Nougat Ice Cream with Honey and Figs (that calls for honey, sugar, figs and the "heaviest possible sweet cream.") [http://bit.ly/mimouna6] And since the holiday is a remembrance of the splitting of the Red Sea, fish is popular, like baked whitefish (Moroccan-style.) [http://bit.ly/mimouna8]

For those of us whose lineage can only be traced to north of the Mediterranean, did you know that we also have our own (very obscure) post-Pesach tradition? As the holiday ends, Ashkenazi Jews can take pride in Rumplenacht, literally the "night of transferring" back into storage our Passover plates and cutlery and reintroducing the regular chametz wares. [http://bit.ly/mimouna9]

And in my family, Rumplenacht just wouldn't be Rumplenacht without the traditional trudging to the bakery at two in the morning to wait for the first batch of steaming bagels to emerge fresh from the oven.

Passover and ego

Rabbi David Cadoch

Passover is at hand, and it seems Pesach is everyone's favourite chag, at least for most families in our community.

To some of us, Passover is synonymous with major house cleaning in search of chametz.

This curious halachic requirement of searching for chametz is based on a biblical passage in Deuteronomy (16:4): "And there shall be no leaven seen with thee in all they borders seven days." Our sages interpret this as an active mitzvah to search for any leavening on our person, in our dwellings and in our businesses.

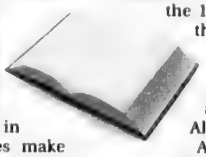
Halachah derives from this passage that possession is forbidden, but to avoid wanton destruction of products containing leavening, a document of sale is drawn up, with a non-Jewish client, to demonstrate that we have sold our leftover chametz products for a specific price.

This is an actual sales transaction, and the key to our storage room is handed over to the buyer, where he or she has the authority to consume it. However, since we stipulate a clause to buy back the products, the new owner (the non-Jew) stands to make some profit when selling it back to the original owner.

What is it about leavening that makes it central to Passover observance? Our sages have formulated profound moral lessons from this concept. They have written anecdotes equating leavening to the symbol of false pride, known in Hebrew as ga'avah – pride of the ego.

Pride is a healthy trait when experienced in a balanced manner – it gives us a sense of value.

Rabbinic Reflections



But what is false pride in this context? Our sages make reference to a haughty pride that makes statements, verbal or non-verbal, in a manner that's hurtful to others. This message can be read as, "I am better, smarter and richer than you." This kind of pride is a self-possessed haughtiness that makes a person think they're beyond reproach.

If anyone tries to reproach this kind of haughty person, they take immediate offence and begrudge the individual who dared possess the audacity to make such a remark. This is where the Torah places importance on the trait of humility, known in Hebrew as anavah.

It's interesting to note that most of the offerings made in Jerusalem at the time of the Temple excluded leavening as an ingredient, with few exceptions, such as the show bread (in Hebrew lechem hapanim), the 12 loaves of bread that were always present on a dedicated table in the Temple as an offering to the Almighty.

Arrogance and pride are true barriers to developing healthy relationships with society, and ultimately the Almighty.

Chag Kasher v'Samayach!

Rabbi David Cadoch is spiritual leader for Shabbat and chagim at Beth HaRambam Synagogue, Donald Berman Maimonides Hospital in Montreal.

Chief rabbi teaches inclusivity

For the past 21 years, Rabbi Jonathan Sacks has served as the chief rabbi of the Hebrew Congregations of the Commonwealth. He is not, however, an authority for Masorti, Reform or liberal Judaism. A remarkable personality, he is the award-winning author of more than 20 books, a profound and original thinker and an eloquent and persuasive orator. As a recipient of a life peerage, he occupies a seat in the House of Lords.

As a sympathetic exponent of modern Orthodoxy he has denounced religious extremism. In his book, The Dignity of Difference (2002), he writes, "Fundamentalism has burst into our society like a dinosaur at a cocktail party." He warns that when it is coupled with nationalism it often leads to wars of religion. Religious extremism, he asserts, is all too often bound up with obscurantism, oppressive legislation and terror, which inevitably alienates those who might have been attracted to religion.

Rabbi Sacks, who is retiring later this year at the age of 65, advocates a "counter-fundamentalism based on the conviction that God has given us many universes of faith." He insists that there is no exclusive way to God and that we must recognize the image of God "in the person not like us... Religions do not need to be authoritarian to possess authority, nor exclusive to be authentic."

In his latest book, Future Tense (2009), a keen analysis of Jews, Judaism and Israel in the 21st century – he makes clear that "Jews have friends among many faiths, and among secular humanists, and that we should cherish them all, making common cause with them in defence of freedom, human dignity and moral responsibility. We should rest secure in our unparalleled past and face the future with vigilance but without fear."

Bookmarks

Bernard Baskin

His Jewish outlook is inclusive rather than exclusive. "I know that not every Jew is Orthodox, and not all believe in God, and find some aspects of our faith unintelligible at best and many find fault with Israel, and others with Diaspora Jewish life. Yet every Jew who stays loyal to his or her people and contributes to it in some way thereby adds something to the story of the Jewish people and becomes an agent of hope in the world, God's partner in redemption."

It should come as no surprise that the rabbi's views have aroused the ire and opposition of the haredi community which refuses to accept his interpretation of Judaism. When The Dignity of Difference appeared in its second edition, the Rabbi made redactions to please opponents, but refused to remove the book already in bookstores.

In his book Another Way, Another Time, British journalist Meir Persoff maintains that "the Orthodox circles that [Rabbi] Sacks seeks to placate will never consider him Orthodox enough no matter what he does."

Evidently there is no easy road to the New Jerusalem.

Wife unaware of husband's record

Family Matters

Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator
for 31 years

Question. I am 35 years old. I got married last year. It was an arranged marriage. After about two weeks of marriage my husband came home drunk one night and assaulted me. When I ran out yelling a lady next door phoned 911. The police arrived and took my husband away. I later discovered my husband had several previous criminal convictions including assault and robbery. Now that I am aware of his criminal background, I do not wish to live with him any more.

I am from a respectable family and now want to divorce him. Should I wait for one year from the date of marriage or separation to file papers for divorce? Is his previous criminal record enough grounds for a divorce? I have little or no income. Can I claim maintenance monthly or in a single lump sum for damages he caused to my life? Can I seek free legal aid for a divorce case? If so to whom should I apply? Please reply in detail and help me as I am clueless. Thank you.

Answer. You don't have to wait one year from the date of separation to file for divorce. It's just that the Court cannot actually grant the divorce until you have been separated for one year — unless you claim that you are asking for a divorce on the grounds of spousal cruelty.

It appears that you may have such grounds because your husband was violent towards you. So long as you have proof of the assault, you could be divorced earlier. If you had the right to claim for spousal support, you would not need to wait for the final divorce trial or judgment, even if you based your divorce claim on one year's separation. In such a case, you could even file within the year and claim in Court for damages (called "assault and battery") and obtain a temporary order pending the final divorce order for spousal support based upon your husband's yearly income.

Unfortunately, your cohabitation was so short (two weeks), you would not likely get any spousal support — whether monthly or lump sum. Furthermore, it is unusual for courts to award lump sum spousal support. At trial, depending on how badly hurt you were, the Court may well award some money in damages for the assault. Call Legal Aid Ontario at 416-979-1446 or toll free at 1-800-668-8258. You may be eligible for Legal Aid if you financially qualify.

Question: I was married and divorced outside of Canada (both were in the United States). Do I still need to go through the same process as people who married in Canada and divorced elsewhere when I remarry? Or can I just apply directly for a marriage license because both events happened outside of the country?

Answer: You can still get married in Ontario, but you require a legal opinion from an Ontario lawyer in a certain form that needs to be filed with the Ontario Registrar General that your foreign divorce is recognized under Canadian Law. For instance, under Canadian law, you can't just fly to Las Vegas, get a "quickie" divorce, come back to Toronto and then remarry. You must stay in Nevada for one year and then get divorced there before Canadian law recognizes the Nevada Court's authority to grant such a divorce.

Question: I was married to my ex-husband for 11 years and separated from him in 1995. We are not legally divorced as of yet. Six years ago, I got a collection agency on me about a satellite dish we had purchased. It even went as far as filing court papers. It also said that it could not pursue my husband because he lives on a reservation. We are both natives. Now I have another company that is coming after me for furniture that was purchased in 1994 or 1995.

Answer: If the purchase pertained to a joint debt, such as for an item purchased on a joint credit card (not a card of which he is the main cardholder and you are only a supplementary cardholder) then you have a legal obligation to pay it. However, once the debt is due, the law only permits creditors two years to sue. Accordingly, in most cases the Ontario Limitations Act will prevent any lawsuit against you. It is therefore likely that any claim on you for the furniture debt going back to 1994-5 will not succeed. If it is not a "joint debt" but a debt solely of your spouse, then you may have an obligation to pay your spouse's unpaid bills for "necessities of life." Depending on the item, furniture may be a different matter.

To all my readers and from my family, Garfin Zeidenberg and I, we would like to wish you a "chag kasher v'sameach!"

Special to The CJN

There is an old saying that you are only as old as you feel.

Susan Shore, who celebrated her 100th birthday on March 19, is proof of this adage.

"I'm a very ordinary person," the centenarian told The CJN, standing straight, her face alit with her indelible smile – but her family and friends disagree.

"My mother is an exercise nut," her daughter, Ronnie Helfand, said. "Since I remember from the time I was a child, she always exercised and still does every day.

"It was not a surprise to me, when I came to visit in the morning, to find her standing on her head."

To celebrate her 100th birthday, 60 members of her family and friends gathered at Toronto's Forest Hill Place, where Susan has been a resident for eight years.

"Susan has a wonderful spirit and family support that allows her to enjoy our Forest Hill Place community and a variety of programs on a daily basis," said Paul Pinkus, executive director of the residence.

Welcoming the guests to the celebration was a large sign, "Celebrating 100 years of Living, Loving and Exercising." Below the sign were pictures taken from every decade of her life.

Her son, Harold Shore, and his family came from Calgary. Her grandchildren and great-grandchildren came to celebrate along with family and friends from Montreal, New Jersey, Minnesota, Vermont and Maryland.

At an interview with The CJN, Susan spoke with joy of her early life. "We were very poor when I was a child, but we didn't know it. We lived through the Depression."

She attended the Central High School of Commerce so that she could get a job and help the family.

She met Louis Shore at a social. He was working at the post office during the day and studying at the College of Art at night.

"In those days," Susan recalled, "a Jewish teacher had difficulty getting a teaching job.

"So we moved to Pelee Island and then to Owen Sound where he found positions teaching. We moved back to Toronto with our two children, and he taught at the Central High School of Commerce until he became the director of art at the Toronto Board of Education."

This gave them the opportunity to travel during the summer, she said. "We enjoyed the opera, symphony, ballet and many cultural events."

Sadly, she added that her husband died at the age of 63, six weeks after he retired.

"My mother continued to travel, and she went to more than 40 countries," Ronnie said. "She always studied the countries before she went there and always came back with fascinating stories and pictures.

"And she would have slide shows for friends, with a commentary."

Ronnie added, "My mother walks with me at Lawrence Plaza every day, as long as the weather permits. Then we go for coffee where she tells me countless stories."

Although she is legally blind, Susan said she always loved reading and today she reads books on CNIB disks and from the library.

Looking back, she spoke of the many courses she took, her volunteer work at Mount Sinai Hospital and her lifelong love of gardening.

She was described by a family member as "strong, independent, fearless and an intrepid woman. A real lady."

Asked what she looks forward to in the future, Susan replied, "I just want to do the same things I'm doing now and enjoying my close family and friends."

MOMS AND DAUGHTERS:
Ulpanat Orot's chesed committee held its annual Mother Daughter Night March 5. The evening included a shiur by Lori Grysman, a performance by the Ulpanat Orot Choir, dessert, dancing and a raffle. All proceeds from the event will go to Misholim – The Jerusalem Expressive Arts Therapy Center, a therapeutic centre for children and youth. Pictured are the committee chairs with their mothers, from left, Talia and Mindy Shiel, Leora and Rivital Grunbaum, Maytal and Ronitte Friedman, and Kathy and Sarah Laszlo. (Rebecca Ansel photo)

FRENCH SPEAKERS:
Grade 7 students at Bialik Hebrew Day School took part in a French public speaking contest recently. Pictured, from left, are winner Oliver D., runner-up Daniel C., teacher Helen Gurofsky, and third-place finisher Louis C. Students presented a speech on a current topic to an external judge who considered fluency, pronunciation, expression and the ability to effectively convey meaning. All students prepared and delivered speeches, with two finalists from each class making the final.

New head of Ottawa federation assumes duties

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Andrea Freedman, the new president and CEO of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa (JFO), officially assumed her duties on March 11, succeeding Mitchell Bellman, who held the position for the past 15 years.

"The first week has been great. People have been terrific, incredibly warm and welcoming, and very committed to the community," said Freedman.

Coming from Toronto where she was vice-president of philanthropy and operations at the Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation, Freedman is a Montreal native who previously lived in Ottawa while a student at Carleton University. A circuitous career path has brought her full circle, back to the city.

Following her graduation from McGill University with a degree in political science, Freedman spent a year in Israel with Project Otzma, which offers young Jewish adults the opportunity to live and volunteer in Israel. On her return to Canada, she enrolled at Carleton University for a master's program in political science, intending to go on to law school and volunteer in the Jewish community.

An application she made for a summer job was passed along to the executive director of the Jewish Community Centre in Springfield, Mass., who hired Freedman as a full-time youth director, a job that lasted for the next two years and forever changed her career path. She returned to school at the University of Michigan for a master's degree in social work and Jewish communal work, and the rest, as they say, is history.

After a six-year stint back in Montreal, working for Federation CJA, Freedman moved to Toronto, beginning as associate campaign director at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto; then director of special initiatives for Jewish Toronto Tomorrow; then national director of planning and development at Jewish Federations of Canada – UIA, the national umbrella organization of Canada's Jewish federations.

Freedman's immediate goals in Ottawa include meeting as many people as possible and beginning to build relationships. "Top of my list is reaching out to our donors, heads of community organizations, board members, rabbis and members of the community," she said. "I hope to create a more integrated and holistic fundraising effort," between federation and the Ottawa Jewish Community Foundation (OJCF).

"There is an excitement, enthusiasm and real positive energy that I feel from the community and that I am ready to contribute to," said Freedman. "To focus on issues that are meaningful to you – it is a privilege to be able to do it for your job."

The community is equally enthusiastic in welcoming Freedman to her new position. "From the moment outgoing CEO Mitchell Bellman announced his resignation in August, the federation board has worked tirelessly to ensure that the organization would find the best possible candidate for the job, a superb new leader to help take us forward. In hiring Andrea, we have accomplished our goal," said federation chair Debbie Halton-Weiss.

Imam builds bridges with shul

OTTAWA — A group of Muslim students and congregants accompanied Imam Mohamed Jebara for a friendly and educational visit with his friend Cantor Daniel Benlolo at Congregation Beth Shalom earlier this month.

Jebara, the headmaster at Cordova Academy and Andalusia College, and his group were warmly welcomed to the synagogue March 10 by Benlolo for an afternoon of sharing, of both information and more tangible gifts.

Benlolo presented Jebara with a shofar, a menorah, a kiddush cup and a book about the history of Beth Shalom.

Jebara gave Benlolo a carved wooden Qur'an holder and several copies of the Qur'an, as well as a prayer rug and a string of prayer beads.

"We are collecting Jewish artifacts and books, which will be used to educate our students at Andalusia College and Cordova Academy. We still need tfillin, a tallit and a yad for our display," said Jebara in an email to The CJN. (He had been suffering from a throat infection and was unable to speak at the event).

Benlolo and Jebara both emphasized the similarities between their two religions.

"The visit to the synagogue was a fascinating experience for all my students and members of my congregation who were present," Jebara said.

"It was so heartwarming to sow the seeds of friendship with members of our elder-sister religion, a religion with which we share so many beliefs and practices. In fact, there is not a religion on earth more similar to Islam than Judaism."

Cantor Daniel Benlolo and Imam Mohamed Jebara at Beth Shalom

Both clergymen have been involved in interfaith dialogue with various other local religious groups, and they're united in their goal to further learn from one another.

"We would like our collaboration to lead to understanding, respect, friendship and ultimately love. Furthermore, we would like to organize classes for each other to learn about each other's beliefs, practices, ceremonies and rituals. Picnics, community service and joint charitable work are also in the forecast," Jebara said.

Benlolo said other ideas include mixed sports teams for university students, such as hockey or basketball.

"Each team would consist of students from both groups, so they would learn to interact in a friendly manner," he said.

"[Beth Shalom's] Rabbi [Scott] Rosenberg and I have been working together to promote interfaith experiences in our synagogue. We greet and encourage many school and religious groups to come through our doors at Beth Shalom, to teach and learn from each other, thus building bridges in the community," Benlolo added.

Threats loom in Iran and Syria: columnist

Joel Jacobson
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Jonathan Spyer confirmed what others before him have been saying: if the United States and the West don't show strength against Iran's development of nuclear arms, then Israel will have to act alone to stop the threat.

Speaking to an audience at Beth Israel Synagogue in Halifax on March 14, the senior fellow at the Global Research in International Affairs Centre, Herzliya, Israel, and Jerusalem Post columnist, said, "If the U.S. doesn't rise to the occasion, and it appears it won't, as [President Barack] Obama wants to do more with his domestic policy than his foreign policy, Israel might have to accept a nuclear Iran or act unilaterally.

"Talk can only go so far. Without a credible threat from the West, Israel has to step up or Iran will move forward."

Spyer was concluding a week-long speaking tour that covered Toronto, Hamilton, Fredericton, and Halifax. The event was sponsored by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs with the Maritime portion assisted by Atlantic Jewish Council.

While in Halifax for one busy day, Spyer also met with media and addressed students of Dalhousie University's political science and Centre For Foreign Policy Studies programs, as well as the Dalhousie Law School.

At Beth Israel, Spyer noted that the Arab Spring, the tumultuous overthrow of despotic regimes in Tunisia, Libya, Yemen and Egypt, has presented advantages to Israel.

"The Sunni-Shia ongoing conflict in Iran and the civil war in Syria have kept these nations busy internally," he said.

"And while Iran has the wealth to finance its own military and other programs, countries where Sunni Islamists have taken control are broke financially. The Sunnis are weak and disorganized, with massive problems of illiteracy and feminist uprisings so have internal struggles. That's a benefit to Israel."

He stressed Israel can defend itself against its enemies because "we have a wonderful economy and a strong military that is capable of overcoming the threat of the Sunni Islamists."

He gave an overview of the Syrian civil war to the Dalhousie political science and foreign policy students."

He said Syrian President Bashar Assad told the Wall Street Journal in early 2011 that Syria wouldn't be affected by the Arab Spring because he wasn't elected and didn't represent the people.

After he failed to crush demonstrations that started in March 2011 and then spread, Assad offered some concessions that didn't work. A month later, he was trying to forcefully allay confrontations, but they escalated into armed revolt that continues two years later.

The fighting has led to a military stalemate, but with the loss of almost 100,000 lives and 1.2 million Syrians fleeing to other Middle East countries.

Jonathan Spyer speaks about Middle East issues at Beth Israel Synagogue in Halifax. (Joel Jacobson photo)

"The regime of Assad has lasted longer than anyone thought it would," Spyer said. "He has suffered no losses of core people around him, and his security forces have remained in place even though many lesser officials and rank-and-file people have left him. Meanwhile, the rebels have been dogged by an inability to unify into a single structure, without a defined leader."

Spyer said he's been in northern Syria several times during the conflict and has seen the suffering of the Syrian people.

"Conditions are dreadful. Even if the [Assad] regime falls, don't assume things will go back to normal. The various Sunni elements will struggle to decide who will be the new boss. It will lead to new conflicts."

Talmud Torah plans $20M expansion

Vancouver school has population of over 500

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Cathy Lowenstein is the first to admit that Vancouver Talmud Torah (VTT) is really cramped for space.

As head of school, she's seen enrolment numbers rise considerably in the decade she's presided over Vancouver's largest Jewish elementary school. There were 409 students in the 2004-2005 school year. Today, there are 508 occupying a building originally constructed for a maximum of 450.

"Without expanding the school, we won't be able to continue productively," she says. "We'd have to take our enrolment down and deny some families a Jewish education. This expansion project is urgent."

Lowenstein is referring to the $20-million capital campaign to finance the two-part project. One will be the construction of shared underground parking with neighbouring Congregation Beth Israel, and the second will be the addition of 42,000 square feet of space to the school and the revitalization of the remaining 38,000 square feet.

The school has received a $5-million gift from the Gordon and Leslie Diamond Foundation, contingent upon raising the remaining $15 million. As of earlier this month, $10.9 million had been raised – excluding the Diamond gift – and the capital campaigners were focused on the final $4.1 million, which they hope to raise by the end of next month.

If they can do it, the VTT can begin the expansion in June 2014. If not, the school will have to wait an additional full school year before it can break ground.

"We need the community to support us, whether their gift is $18, $1,800 or $18,000," says Sue Hector, fundraising co-chair. "Eighty per cent of donations will come from our top major donors, but we really need the community to pick up 20 per cent of the campaign."

The expansion will be tailored to support 21st-century learning skills, which means supporting students in a more project-based, collaborative environment, says Andrea Wilkinson, VTT's director of development.

"Twenty-first-century learning is very different. It's not about sitting in rows of desks. It's built around creativity, collaboration and communication, with an eye to the fact that learning happens anywhere."

While space for collaborative learning is not available right now, students have been ingenious about finding it, Lowenstein says.

"They find it under stairwells, in the washrooms, alcoves and the gymnasium. But we need more space so we can take future enrolment of up to 650 students, so that we can accommodate a preschool that's tripled in size over the last 10 years and so that we can continue to support over 170 students who require remedial or enrichment programs. Not having the space to do that properly is really impacting us."

Wilkinson agrees. "We're crammed to the hilt here," she says. "We've been innovative about making space, but we're at a point where we have to expand."

Vancouver Talmud Torah

Last summer, VTT erected a portable structure on its playground to accommodate the Grade 4 class, which had previously been housed at Beth Israel. Another small piece of playground is being used for temporary parking for faculty. That means the playground is only 44 per cent of the size recommended by the province. The expansion will enlarge it, remove the portables and redesign the playground in a way that enhances play.

Hector, a VTT parent for the past 13 years, emphasized that a gift to VTT is a gift to ensure the future of Vancouver's Jewish community.

"For me this expansion means kids in Vancouver's Jewish community will always have a community school that will be open to them. We're doing this to make sure everyone's kids and grandkids get to experience how wonderful VTT is."

Without the expansion, she adds, the school will have to revert back to 450 kids. By the time the 80 children currently enrolled in Grade 2 reach grades 6 and 7, the school won't have room for them.

"We can't afford not to do this," says Michelle Gerber, co-president of the VTT board. "This is a once in a generation project, the right thing to do for the future. There comes a time when we have to do what needs to be done, and this is that time."

Chabad of Winnipeg unveils new mikvah

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Chabad Lubavitch community unveiled its new mikvah and a donor wall of honour at the south Winnipeg Chabad Jewish Learning Centre.

Art and Soul, as the March 13 event was called, also featured an art exhibition and sale of the works of internationally known artist Michoel Muchnik, who designed the wall of honour.

The evening began with the unveiling of the wall. The scene, Muchnik explained, is set on a backdrop of fields and rolling Jerusalem hills and depicts a couple planting spiritual "aleph" seeds. Dispersed throughout the bas-relief are mosaic tiles adorned with decorative designs, plants and fruits of Israel. The building in the background has three arched windows representing avodah, Torah study and charity.

On either side of the painting are two large white Jerusalem urns with greenery rising out of them, representing prosperity and growth, "the fruits of our labours," Muchnik said. The names of donors who helped fund construction of the Chabad centre, which opened during Chanukah 2011, are on plaques attached to the painted urns.

Rabbi Avrohom Altein, executive director of the Chabad Jewish Learning Centre, said that the Rebbe stated that those who are gifted with artistic talent have a responsibility to transform scenes from the material to the spiritual, to combine art with soul.

Muchnik said that he has known Rabbi Altein and his wife, Brocha, for many years. "I tried in the painting to capture what Chabad has done worldwide and what the Alteins have accomplished here," he said. "Chabad has planted seeds in Jewish communities all over the world. It is gratifying to see them taking root and growing. I pray that the seeds will continue to grow and produce beautiful fruit."

Rabbi Avrohom Altein, left, with artist Michoel Muchnik, beside the donor wall of honour he designed for Winnipeg Chabad.

In introducing the wall of honour, Abe Anhang, who served as co-chair of Chabad's capital campaign – along with Dave Rich – reviewed all that the Alteins have accomplished in their more than 40 years in Winnipeg.

"They arrived here with a mandate from the Rebbe himself to establish Chabad in Winnipeg," Anhang said. "This building, which was 10 years in the planning and construction, is the culmination of their efforts here."

In addition to providing a place for services, the building houses the Jewish Learning Institute, led by Rabbi Shmuley Altein; a preschool, which has an enrolment of 30 children this year; a kosher kitchen; a multi-purpose room that accomodates 175 people and a new mikvah that rivals some of Winnipeg's spas in elegance.

The mikvah has traditionally played a central role in Jewish communal and family life. Rabbi Altein organized the building of Winnipeg's first Chabad mikvah in the north end on Hartford Avenue and McGregor Street more than 35 years ago. That mikvah is still in use.

There is also a community mikvah in the Asper Jewish Community Campus.

At Art and Soul, the importance and mysteries of the mikvah were brought home through a short film and thoughts on the subject by some of the women who will be volunteer staff at the new mikvah.

Guests attending the Art and Soul evening were encouraged to tour the women's mikvah. There is a separate mikvah for men.

It's important that Jewish children be born and grow up in the right soil if they are going to remain observant Jews when they become adults, Rabbi Altein said. "Mikvah is a very important part of that. That is why we wanted to make sure this mikvah is built with class and offers a warm atmosphere.

"We hope more people come and use it."

British ex-pat plans Jewish Expo

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

The first ever Everything Jewish Expo, is set to take place April 14 from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. at the Richmond Hill Golf and Country Club.

The family-friendly event, organized by Jeremy Ansell of Ansell Publishing Inc. and sponsored by the Schwartz/Reisman Centre, RBC and BMO, will feature exhibits and vendors showcasing rich Jewish culture and business diversity in the GTA.

Exhibitors range from providers of Jewish education to camps, musicians, travel agencies, financial services, food companies, caterers and retirement homes.

Ansell, 42, a native of England, who moved here via Israel, said he organized the expo "in the heart of York Region so it would be close to the growing Jewish population north of the city.

"With such a large community here today, the need to produce such a showcase has been growing over the past few years."

The show will have something for everyone, he said, regardless of age or religious affiliation.

The show emulates the British Jewish Living Expo, held at Wembley Stadium in London, he said. "They have 300 vendors and attract 10,000 visitors.

"Admission to our event is free, and we expect a large turnout."

He plans on running the expo twice a year, with the next one set for October.

Toronto sisters raise money to aid homeless youth

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Jaime and Alexandra Eckler have been on a mission to raise money for Toronto's homeless youth, one glass of lemonade at a time.

The sisters, ages eight and six respectively, held their first lemonade stand in 2009, after Jaime encountered a homeless man sitting under the Gardiner Expressway.

"I went to a basketball game when I was four years old, and on the way home I saw a guy sitting under a bridge. I asked my dad who he was and why was he sitting there. He told me he was a homeless man. I felt bad so I gave him the apple I had," Jaime said.

Later that summer, inspired by the man she helped, Jaime wanted to start raising money for homeless people.

Their mother, Sharon Zohar, had heard the story of Amanda Belzowski, a teenager who has raised more than $200,000 for the Heart and Stroke Foundation since holding her first lemonade stand at two years old. Zohar took her daughters to meet Belzowski, and Jaime immediately decided she wanted to raise money the same way.

Over the last four years, the Eckler sisters have raised more than $13,000 for various homeless organizations, including Raising the Roof and Eva's Initiatives.

Now, for their fifth annual fundraiser, the Ecklers have mobilized their entire school, the Montessori Jewish Day School, to take part in their charity.

The students, along with Jaime and Alexandra, will mount a photography exhibit on May 5 at Beth David Synagogue, with all proceeds going to Ve'ahavta, a Canadian humanitarian relief organization. The exhibit has been registered with the Scotiabank Contact Photography Festival and will include the children's original digital photography that revolves around the theme of homelessness.

The festival of pictures, which runs from 2 to 5 p.m., will feature music, games and plenty of lemonade.

"I thought it would be fun to include my friends in all the work because it's so much fun," said Jaime. "They seem to really like doing it. I can tell by the smiles on their faces."

Zohar said her family hopes to attract hundreds of people to the event and create media attention. "The more people who know about the work the girls are doing, the closer we can get to reaching our goal of raising $10,000 this year. I also hope our school community is recognized and rewarded for their hard work and participation. Jaime and Alexandra are very proud of their school and are happy to share this event with them."

To show their appreciation for the girls' accomplishments, Prime Minister Stephen Harper and Toronto Mayor Rob Ford have sent personal letters to Jaime and Alexandra. The sisters were also invited as special guests to several engagements, including Furniture Bank and the Ontario Triullium Foundation to talk about their cause.

More support came in the form of donations and offers to build the girls a free website (www.jaals.ca). One particularly interesting proposal came from a medic who wanted to promote the cause at the London Olympics by wearing a Jaime and Alexandra T-shirt during the games.

Though Jaime and Alexandra are young, Zohar said they show a strong interest and dedication to their cause. "I am very proud of the work the girls have done and most importantly their commitment to want to do it year after year. It's not easy for kids to keep their attention on one project for so long."

They're learning that "doing something" can make a big difference, she said. "As much as they may want things to change, they know nothing will happen if they don't put in the effort."

Jaime said she wishes homeless people "could have a life like ours because they are people just like us."

To express her feelings about being charitable, Alexandra said, "I love doing this event every year because it's so much fun and it brings out all our friends and family. I love seeing everyone so happy on this day."

The Jewish General Hospital

JGH earns high marks from rating agencies

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — Despite a projected deficit this year of $17.5 million, the Jewish General Hospital (JGH) received ringing endorsements from two independent rating bodies this month.

On March 6, the Canadian Institute for Health Information (CIHI) ranked the JGH as the most administratively efficient hospital in Canada.

According to the CIHI, the JGH is No. 1 among Canadian teaching hospitals when administrative costs are measured as a proportion of a hospital's total expenses.

The CIHI, a not-for-profit organization, also places the JGH among the country's top hospitals in the quality of its care and the success of its medical outcomes.

In particular, it ranks the JGH in the sixth-best spot in "cost per weighted case," that is, the overall cost of treatment, when variables are adjusted to allow for comparisons among different types of patients and medical specialties.

More than 600 health-care institutions are listed in the CIHI report, ranked according to a total of 27 indicators – 21 clinical and six financial.

"We are very pleased that the JGH ranks among Canada's top health-care institutions, many of which are located right here in Quebec," said executive director Hartley Stern, who announced this month that he will be stepping down in October after five years.

"Quebeckers should be reassured that some of their hospitals are, indeed, among the best in the country."

More recently, on March 14, the JGH scored a near-perfect 96.7 per cent in the evaluation of its performance by Accreditation Canada, also an independent, not-for-profit organization.

The score is based on a comprehensive and rigorous investigation of the JGH's performance measured against national standards of excellence.

The JGH was found to have complied with more than 96.5 per cent of the criteria that must be present for safety and proper quality of care, including accessibility, continuity of care and good workplace conditions.

The hospital was also found to have complied with 34 of Accreditation Canada's 35 requirements in such key areas as safety, risk assessment, the use of medication, infection control, communication and work life.

An embrace and a push in Obama's Jerusalem speech

Matti Friedman
The Times of Israel

Analysis

A speech U.S. President Barack Obama made in Jerusalem on his first official visit to Israel got an enthusiastic response from the young audience.

The March 21 speech seemed designed to woo Israelis and calm their fears, as well as prod them toward a peace agreement with the Palestinians.

The key phrase was delivered in Hebrew. "So long as there is a United States of America," Obama said, "Atem lo levad." That's Hebrew for, "You are not alone."

Obama had a friendly, clearly left-leaning crowd of about 1,000, mostly university students and reporters, who applauded loudly and often. The speech was marred only once when a pro-Palestinian protester shouted from the hall.

The interruption came a moment after Obama mentioned the "lively debate" in Israeli society, and he referenced his own comment – "that's the lively debate we were talking about" – without losing his grin or his composure, earning a standing ovation from the crowd as the heckler was removed.

The cool attitude toward Israel that Obama displayed in his first term has been dramatically replaced during this visit by a warm, almost Clintonesque charm offensive that appears to be working.

"We're so easy," said Channel 2 TV's political reporter, Udi Segal, after the speech. "Twenty-four hours, a few hugs, and that's it." Not doing this four years ago might be remembered as one of the foreign policy errors of Obama's first term.

In an official response released after the speech, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu thanked Obama for his "unconditional support for Israel" and said he agreed that they must work toward a "peace that guarantees the safety of all Israeli citizens."

Obama opened his speech with a pop-culture reference, joking that his disagreements with Netanyahu – now "my friend Bibi" – had actually been a plot to generate material for Eretz Nehederet, or A Wonderful Country, a popular TV satire show. That got a laugh.

In a sign of the remarkable display of affection, genuine or not, between Obama and Netanyahu, the Israeli prime minister's official response Thursday evening included a humorous reference to that line from the speech and to the closing line of every episode of the show: "Prime Minister Netanyahu," read the statement, "agrees with President Obama that we have a wonderful country."

Obama also spoke about the festival of Passover and its message of freedom.

He expressed sympathy for Israelis living with rocket fire, saying "children the same age as my daughters" went to bed with the fear of rockets "because of who they are and where they live." He mentioned the five Israelis killed by terrorists in Bulgaria, and said Hezbollah, thought to be behind the attack, should be called "what it truly is – a terrorist organization."

But Obama also spoke of the plight of the Palestinians, noting the presence of a "foreign army" controlling their movement, settlement construction, and a failure to punish violence by settlers. Just as Jews deserve independence, so do Palestinians, he said.

Given demographics, he said, the only way for Israel to survive as a Jewish, democratic nation is by the creation of an "independent and viable Palestine."

Israel needs peace because "no wall will be high enough" to keep out every threat, he said, and "security must be at the centre of any agreement."

The United States, he promised, "will oppose unilateral efforts to bypass negotiations through the United Nations." But the Palestinian "right to justice" needs to be recognized.

He quoted former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon, saying that if Israel pursues control of all of the land of Israel, it will "lose it all." (He also quoted David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister, and name-checked former Likud leader Menachem Begin and Labor leader Yitzhak Rabin, which, along with the reference to the satire show, achieved impressive coverage of Israel's ideological spectrum.)

He praised Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Prime Minister Salam Fayyad as real partners. "There's an opportunity. There's a window," he said. "Peace is possible."

Most Israelis, even moderates, are highly skeptical of that point. Palestinian leaders turned down Israeli peace proposals in 2000, 2001 and 2008. The Islamists of Hamas now control Gaza, and could well come to power in the West Bank after any Israeli withdrawal. Few Israelis believe that a peace agreement of the kind envisioned in the 1990s is a real possibility.

But Obama wasn't specific about what he was calling on Israel to do, expressing instead a hope that Israelis will pressure their leaders to pursue peace. Earlier in the day, at a press conference in Ramallah, he made clear to the Palestinians that he opposes preconditions to talks – a reversal of his first term, when he introduced a demand for a settlement freeze that played a part in deadlocking negotiations for several years.

He reminded listeners that Israel is "the most powerful country in this region, and has the support of the most powerful country in the world." Israel, he seemed to mean, can afford to take risks.

Of Iran's nuclear program, a major bone of contention during his first term, he said, "It's no wonder Israelis view this as an existential threat." It is a threat to the United States as well, he said.

But Iran is "under more pressure than ever before, and that pressure is increasing," thanks to U.S.-led sanctions, and there is a joint interest in resolving this "peacefully," through "strong and principled diplomacy."

But "all options are on the table," Obama said: "America will do what we must to prevent a nuclear-armed Iran."

Meanwhile, in Ramallah earlier in the day, Obama indicated that Palestinians could not expect an Israeli settlement freeze ahead of talks. He said Israeli politics were "complex," and that this is "not an issue that will be solved overnight."

The warmth visible in his meetings with Israelis, however, was not evident in Ramallah. Abbas, speaking next to Obama, opened by criticizing Israeli actions, and following Obama's statement, he said that the world recognizes that Israeli settlements are illegal and that many Palestinians "do not trust the two-state solution anymore" as a result.

"Peace should not be made through violence, occupation, settlements, arrests, siege" and the denial of the rights of refugees, Abbas said.

Obama said the United States wants an "independent, viable and contiguous Palestinian state as the homeland of the Palestinian people, alongside the Jewish State of Israel." Palestinians, he said, deserve an end to occupation and the indignities that come with it, and deserve freedom of movement.

He reminded listeners that the United States is the Palestinians' biggest donor and blamed Hamas for "misery" in Gaza. The situation there, he said, came about "because Hamas refuses to renounce violence… because too often it focuses on tearing Israel down than building Palestine up."

Obama also condemned the rocket fire from Gaza last Thursday, saying it was a "violation that Hamas had a responsibility to prevent."

'Holocaust will never happen again'

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel does not owe its existence to the Holocaust, but its existence prevents another one from happening, U.S. President Barack Obama said on the third and final day of his first presidential visit to Israel.

"Here we hope," Obama said March 22 at Yad Vashem's Hall of the Children after touring the Holocaust memorial museum in Jerusalem.

"Because after you walk through these halls, after you pass through the darkness, there is light – a glorious view of the Jerusalem Forest, with the sun shining over the historic homeland of the Jewish people, a fulfilment of the prophecy: 'you shall live again… upon your own soil,'" he said. "Here, on your ancient land, let it be said for all the world to hear: The State of Israel does not exist because of the Holocaust. But with the survival of a strong Jewish State of Israel, such a Holocaust will never happen again."

Obama, in a 2009 Cairo speech to the Muslim world, decried the proliferation of Holocaust denial in some Muslim sectors. His phrasing in that speech suggested to some Jewish and Israeli leaders that he was predicating Israel's existence on the Holocaust, although Obama's aides denied that was his intention. One of the aims of his current trip has been to roll back that impression.

Before visiting Yad Vashem, Obama laid wreaths on the graves of the founder of modern Zionism, Theodor Herzl, and that of the late Israeli premier Yitzhak Rabin, who was assassinated in 1995 by a Jewish extremist.

At the grave, Obama met Rabin's daughter, Dalia Rabin-Pelossof, and two grandchildren of the late Israel leader, whom Obama called "a remarkable man." In keeping with Jewish tradition, Obama also placed on the grave a pebble, which Obama brought from the foot of the Martin Luther King, Jr. Memorial in Washington, D.C.

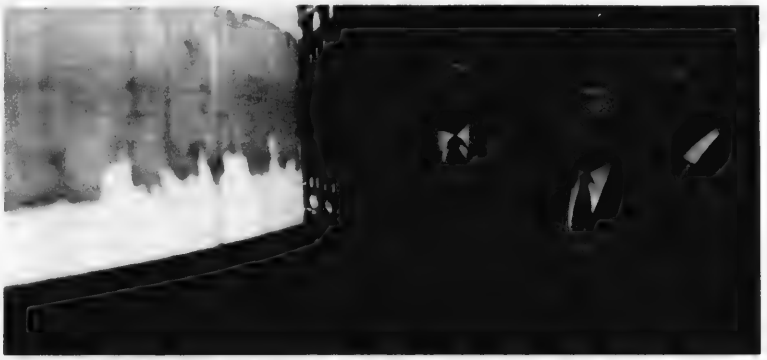
Visual mementos of a presidential tour



President Barack Obama was kept very busy during his recent visit to Israel. These are a few scenes from his tour. Clockwise from top, the president visited the Shrine of the Book at the Israel Museum in Jerusalem to view the Dead Sea Scrolls; he received the Presidential Medal of Honour from Israeli President Shimon Peres; at the concluding dinner on March 21, he exchanged a few whispers with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, and then on the same occasion, he met Yityish Aynaw, Miss Israel 2013. (Israel Sun photos)

Try stuffed vegetables – no matzah!

Eileen Goltz
Special to The CJN

You can stuff almost any vegetable, and I'm going to suggest you stuff your vegetables with other vegetables. Use fresh, if possible, and keep the cheese and meats to a minimum. Too often we think of Pesach as time when we have to do without, but if you think of it as a time to be creative, embrace the challenge and figure out a way to keep your meals light, filling and actually good for you (and as matzah free and fat free as possible)

STUFFED POTATOES

6 medium baking potatoes (6 oz. each)
2 tbsp. olive oil, butter or margarine, melted
1 tbsp. ground white horseradish (fresh or sauce), divided
1 cup thinly sliced green onions
1 large sweet red pepper, finely chopped
1/2 cup fresh broccoli florets, finely chopped
1/2 cup chopped black olives
1 cup shredded cheddar cheese, divided
Parmesan cheese to taste

Scrub and pierce potatoes. Bake at 400 for 40-50 minutes or until tender. Cool slightly. Cut each potato in half lengthwise. Scoop out the pulp, leaving a thin shell (save pulp for another use). Place potato shells on an ungreased baking sheet.

Combine butter and 1/2 teaspoon horseradish and brush over shells. Broil a few inches from the heating element for 5 to 7 minutes or until edges are crispy and butter is bubbly. Remove from the heat immediately. Don't let them burn!

In a bowl combine the onions, olives, red pepper, broccoli, 3/4 cup cheese and remaining horseradish. Mix to combine then spoon the mixture into the cooked potato skins. Sprinkle the tops of the stuffed potatoes with the remaining cheddar cheese and a little Parmesan cheese. Broil 2 to 3 minutes longer or until cheese is melted. Serves 12.

CHEESY STUFFED MUSHROOMS

12 whole portabella mushrooms
1 tbsp. olive oil
1 tbsp. minced garlic
1 (8-oz.) package cream cheese, softened
1/3 cup grated Parmesan cheese
1/4 tsp. ground black pepper
1/4 tsp. onion powder
1 chopped red pepper
2 tbsp. minced parsley

Preheat oven to 350. Spray a baking sheet with cooking spray. Clean mushrooms with a damp paper towel. Carefully break off stems. Chop stems extremely fine. Heat oil in a large skillet over medium heat. Add garlic, red pepper and chopped mushroom stems to the skillet.

Fry until any moisture has disappeared, but don't let it burn. Set aside to cool slightly and then stir in the parsley. When garlic and mushroom mixture is cool, mix in the cream cheese, Parmesan cheese, black pepper and onion powder. Mixture should be very thick. Using a spoon, fill each mushroom cap with a generous amount of stuffing. Arrange the mushroom caps on prepared cookie sheet. Bake for 20 minutes in the preheated oven, or until the mushrooms are piping hot and liquid starts to form under caps. Serve immediately. Makes 12.

STUFFED ROASTED ONIONS

10 medium red onions
1 lb. sliced pastrami or turkey pastrami cut into bite-sized pieces
3 stalks of celery cut into 1/2-inch-thick slices
1 tsp. salt
1 tsp. black pepper
1 tbsp. minced garlic
1 lb. baby spinach, trimmed and coarsely chopped (4 cups)
1 1/2 cups matzah farfel
2 cups salted cashews coarsely chopped
1 stick margarine, melted
1 1/4 cups chicken or vegetable broth

Make onion shells:

Cut a 1/2-in.-thick slice from tops of onions, discarding tops, and trim just enough from bottoms for onions to stand upright. Scoop out all but outer 2 or 3 layers from each using a small ice cream scoop or spoon (don't worry if you make a hole in the bottom), reserving scooped-out onion and onion shells separately.

Make stuffing:

Coarsely chop enough scooped-out onion to measure 3 cups.

Cook pastrami in 2 batches in a 12-in. heavy skillet over moderate heat, stirring until crisp, about 5 minutes, then transfer with a slotted spoon to paper towels to drain, reserving about 1/3 cup fat in skillet. Add chopped onion, celery, salt and pepper to skillet and sauté over moderately high heat, stirring until vegetables are softened, about 5 minutes. Add garlic and sauté, stirring for 1 minute. Transfer mixture to a large bowl and stir in spinach, cashews, farfel, 1 cup broth and pastrami. Then cool completely.

Roast onions:

Preheat oven to 425. Arrange onion shells, open sides up, in a 13x9-in. baking pan, then add 1/2 cup water and cover pan tightly with foil. Roast onions in middle of oven until tender but not falling apart, 25 to 30 minutes.

Reduce oven temperature to 350. Transfer shells to a work surface and pour off water in pan. Fill shells with stuffing, mounding it, and return to pan. Bake stuffed onions in middle of oven, uncovered, until heated through, about 25 minutes.

Cook's notes: Stuffing can be prepared and onions can be stuffed 1 day ahead and chilled, covered. Bring stuffed onions to room temperature before baking. Makes 10.

Iran's Khamenei threatens Israel

The Times of Israel

TEHRAN — Iran's supreme leader threatened to destroy Tel Aviv and Haifa if Israel dares to attack his country.

"Sometimes the leaders of the Zionist regime threaten us," Ayatollah Ali Khamenei said in speech televised live on March 21, coinciding with U.S. President Barack Obama's visit to Israel and discussion in Jerusalem of ways to thwart Iran's nuclear program.

"They should know that if they attack us, we will turn Tel Aviv and Haifa into wastelands," Khamenei said.

He also said he isn't opposed to direct talks with the United States to resolve Iran's nuclear standoff with the West, but he wasn't optimistic such talks would yield results unless Washington stops imposing sanctions against the Islamic Republic.

Khamenei said the offer of direct bilateral talks is an American tactic to deceive the public and impose its will on Tehran.

He was speaking to a crowd in northeastern Iran on the first day of the new Persian calendar year.

The United States and its allies fear Iran could ultimately develop a nuclear weapon, a charge Tehran denies.

Eager to reassure Israel, Obama promised March 20 to work closely with Israel and do whatever is necessary to keep Iran from obtaining nuclear arms, "the world's worst weapons." He also pledged to investigate whether chemical weapons were used last week in neighbouring Syria's two-year-old civil war.

Obama, meeting with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in Jerusalem on his first visit to the Jewish state as president, said of Iran's nuclear ambitions: "We prefer to resolve this diplomatically and there is still time to do so." But he added that "all options are on the table" if diplomacy falls short.

"The question is, will Iranian leadership seize that opportunity," he added, noting that Iran's past behaviour indicated that "we can't even trust yet, much less verify."

Netanyahu, at Obama's side during the two leaders' joint news conference Wednesday, said that while he appreciated U.S. efforts to thwart Iran's pursuit of nuclear weapons through diplomacy and sanctions, those tools "must be augmented by a clear and credible threat of military action."

"I am absolutely convinced that the president is determined to prevent Iran from getting nuclear weapons," Netanyahu said. "I appreciate that. I appreciate the fact that the president has reaffirmed, more than any other president, Israel's right and duty to defend itself, by itself, against any threat."

Pope to seek closer ties with other religions

Ruth Ellen Gruber
JTA

ROME — When the white smoke rose last week at the Vatican, signaling to the world that the College of Cardinals had chosen a new pope, Catholics weren't the only ones waiting with bated breath.

Jews, too, were eager to see whether the new pontiff would be someone familiar with their concerns. Would he be a non-European unfamiliar with the Jewish people and the weighty legacy of the Holocaust? Would he carry on the approach of his immediate predecessors and work to further Jewish-Catholic relations?

After the new pope appeared before the masses in St. Peter's Square, it didn't take long for him to signal that he would maintain the church's outreach to Jews. Nor did it take long for the Jews to sing his praises.

> 'The closeness between Francis and the Jewish community is special and precious'

Pope Francis told Jewish leaders that Catholics and Jews are "bound by a very special spiritual bond."

The new pontiff also pledged to foster the interfaith dialogue begun with the Nostra Aetate decree of the Second Vatican Council.

"I thank you for your presence and trust that with the help of the Almighty, we can continue that fruitful fraternal dialogue that the council wished for," he said. "And that it is actually achieved, bringing many fruits, especially during the last decades."

Francis made the remarks during an audience with the Jewish, Muslim, Buddhist, Hindu, Sikh, Jain and non-Catholic Christian delegations that had attended his inauguration a day earlier.

As it turns out, Pope Francis, 76 – née Jorge Bergoglio of Argentina – was from outside Europe and had a long history of interfaith outreach and good relations with the Jews. He's the first pope from the Americas, as well as the first in more than a millennium from outside Europe.

The new pontiff "is no stranger to us," World Jewish Congress President Ronald Lauder, who met with Bergoglio in Buenos Aires in 2008, said in a statement. "He always had an open ear for our concerns.

"By choosing such an experienced man, someone who is known for his open-mindedness, the cardinals have sent an important signal to the world," Lauder said. "I am sure that Pope Francis will continue to be a man of dialogue, a man who is able to build bridges with other faiths."

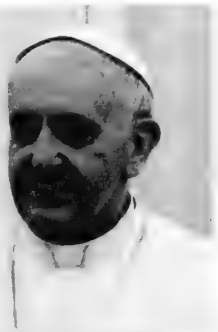
Like pope Benedict before him, Pope Francis, in one of his first official acts, wrote to Rome's chief rabbi, Riccardo Di Segni. He invited Di Segni to the papal inaugural mass and said he hoped "to be able to contribute to the progress that relations between Jews and Catholics have experienced" since the Second Vatican Council in the 1960s.

The election of Pope Francis, Di Segni wrote back, "gives us the hope that the path of friendship, respect and productive collaboration will continue."

Pope John Paul II had made outreach to Jews one of the pillars of his papacy. His successor, Benedict XVI, continued interfaith dialogue but also made several policy decisions that angered Jews, including lifting the excommunication of a renegade bishop who turned out to be a Holocaust denier.

Pope Francis projects a man-of-the-people style in sharp contrast to Benedict, who was seen as removed and cold. Pope Francis is known for living simply, taking the subway and answering his own phone. He spent virtually his entire career in Argentina, away from the intrigues of the Vatican's Roman Curia – the central governing body of the Catholic Church – and other scandals that dogged the papacy of his predecessor.

However, within days of the new pope's election, the Vatican faced questions about what Pope Francis did – and did not do – to oppose the military junta that ruled Argentina from 1976 to 1983. Critics have said the church did not do enough to thwart the military dictatorship's Dirty War, including the kidnapping of two Jesuit priests in 1976. Pope Francis has said he worked behind the scenes to free the priests and sheltered others by hiding them at a Jesuit school.



Pope Francis

The questions about Pope Francis' past carry echoes of the Holocaust-era controversy surrounding pope Pius XII. Many Jews charge that Pius did not do enough to oppose the Nazis, but the Vatican and Pius' proponents say he worked behind the scenes to save Jews.

While a staunch conservative on social issues such as gay marriage, female priests and abortion, Pope Francis spent years working among the poor and made interfaith outreach one of his priorities.

"The Latin American Jewish Congress has had a close relationship with Monsignor Jorge Bergoglio for many years," said Claudio Epelman, executive director of the congress. "We know his virtues and have no doubt whatsoever that he will do an excellent job for the church."

As archbishop of Buenos Aires, his relationship with Argentine Jews was personal as well as institutional.

His only book, Regarding Heaven and Earth, is the transcript of wide-ranging conversations between himself and Rabbi Abraham Skorka, the rector of the Latin American Rabbinical Seminary. Pope Francis and the rabbi also shared billing on an Argentine TV talk show on religious issues.

Pope Francis has referred to Skorka as his "brother and friend." The then-cardinal attended services at Skorka's synagogue and also arranged for Skorka to receive an honorary doctorate from the Catholic University of Argentina.

Pope Francis is cited with particular warmth by Argentine Jews for showing solidarity with the Jewish community following the 1994 bombing of the AMIA Jewish community center in Buenos Aires that left 85 dead. The attack, Francis told the Argentine media, was "another link in the chain of pain and persecution that God's chosen people has suffered throughout history."

In 2005, he signed a petition for justice in the AMIA bombing case and a document called "85 victims, 85 signatures." In June 2010, he visited the rebuilt AMIA building to talk with Jewish leaders.

"The closeness between Francis and the Jewish community is special and precious," Rabbi Gary Bretton-Granatoor, vice president of the World Union of Progressive Judaism, told JTA.

Bretton-Granatoor, who is based in New York but has met Pope Francis a couple of times, called the new pope "a mensch" who "gets the importance of a relationship with the Jewish community, who understands the meaning of the Shoah and has a heart in the right place on a number of issues that concern us as well."

Obviously, he added, "we will vigorously disagree with him on many fundamental issues as well – but that is part of the game, isn't it?"

Suspect in Daniel Pearl murder is arrested

JTA

NEW YORK — Pakistani security officials captured a former terrorist leader who is believed to have planned the 2002 kidnapping and murder of American journalist Daniel Pearl.

Qari Abdul Saeed, also known as Asadullah, was arrested on March 17 by the Pakistani Sindh Rangers, according to March 18 reports citing unnamed Pakistani officials. He is accused of two decades of terror activity.

Pearl's parents, Judea and Ruth, said in a statement released March 18, "We are gratified with this latest arrest and hope that justice will be served in a timely manner on all of those who were involved in the abduction and murder of our son, Danny."

Daniel Pearl

Pearl, the Wall Street Journal South Asia bureau chief, was researching a story about Islamist militants when he was kidnapped in Karachi in January 2002 and murdered a month later.

His final words as he was about to be beheaded – an act that was captured on camera and widely distributed following his death – were "My father is Jewish. My mother is Jewish. I am Jewish."

Thessaloniki remembers lost Jewish community

Gavriel Fiske
The Times of Israel

THESSALONIKI, Greece — Thousands of Greeks took to the streets in this seaside city on March 16 in remembrance of more than 50,000 Jews who lost their lives in Nazi concentration camps during the German World War II occupation of northern Greece.

The march, part of a weekend of commemorative events, began in Eleftherias (Liberty) Square, where the first Jews were rounded up 70 years ago – on March 15, 1943 – before continuing to the old railway station, where they were sent north to their fate in the camps. Most of the community ended up in Auschwitz-Birkenau and did not return.

An estimated 3,500 to 4,000 people turned up on a crisp, cold morning to participate in the march, the first public memorial event of its kind for the Jews of Thessaloniki. The city, also called Salonika or Saloniki, was once home to a thriving and ancient Sephardi community and was known as the "Jerusalem of the Balkans" due to the concentration of Jews, who before World War II made up some 25 per cent of the population.

Today, some 1,000 Jews remain, largely the descendants of the few survivors of the camps or of those who avoided the Nazis by hiding outside the city or joining Greek resistance fighters in the nearby mountains. The Jews of Thessaloniki are today a tightly knit community with three synagogues, an elementary school and close ties to Israel.

Most of the marchers were non-Jewish Greeks of all ages, including a group of anti-fascist activists, representatives of the Greek Orthodox Church, Thessaloniki Mayor Yiannis Boutaris and other government officials. In addition to Jews from Thessaloniki and other Greek communities, international representatives of the World Jewish Congress joined the event as co-sponsors, as did Israeli ambassador to Greece Aryeh Mekel. There was also a delegation of Israelis whose roots lie in the city.

The memorial events took place against the backdrop of the well-publicized rise of the Golden Dawn, the far-right, neo-Nazi and ultra-nationalist political party that made international headlines after receiving seven per cent of the vote in the May 2012 national elections, capturing 21 – out of 300 – seats in the Greek parliament.

The prominence of the Golden Dawn was addressed directly by Greek Prime Minister Antonis Samaras, who spoke at a standing-room-only March 17 memorial event at Monasteriotes Synagogue, the only Jewish house of worship – out of more than 50 – not destroyed by the Nazis.

In his address – it was the first time a Greek prime minister officially visited a Greek synagogue – Samaras said that "neo-Nazis have appeared once again," but that there was "no room for racism and antisemitism" in Greece. As prime minister, he said, he would continue to push for legislation to limit antisemitic and racist speech and activity in Greece.

"We should not be tolerant of this phenomenon," Samaras said to the packed crowd of dignitaries and Jewish community members. "Today, the government is obliged to take any measure to avoid a repetition [of the Holocaust]. Many people are naive to think that this occurred only in the dark corners of history. They are wrong.

"Our mission is to recall that the values governing society should not be taken for granted," he continued. "The Greeks fought against the Nazis… this victory is threatened by isolated voices that offend the memory of our Jewish brethren and others who lost their lives."

Ronald Lauder, president of the World Jewish Congress, which convened its annual executive-council meeting in conjunction with the memorial events in Thessaloniki, also addressed the crowd in Monasteriotes Synagogue, calling for a Greek law "that punishes effectively the denial of the Holocaust."

He said the Golden Dawn are representatives of the "same extremist, fanatic ideology that brought devastation over Europe 70 years ago" and are effectively Nazis who today have "representation in the Greek parliament."

Lauder reminded the audience that Hitler was appointed chancellor of the Weimar Republic during an economic crisis in Germany, much as the Golden Dawn achieved prominence during an extended period of economic instability in Greece, but at the time "there were not enough democrats willing to join forces against the enemies of freedom and democracy."

Modern Greece, he predicted, "in spite of the economic crisis, will be strong enough to rein in" extremist forces and will subsequently "witness a golden dawn of a different kind," as a "prosperous country that will have the affection of its people and the admiration of its neighbours."

Greek Jewish community head and Thessaloniki resident David Saltiel, speaking with the Times of Israel after the memorial events, said that the last few years had been a time of "great difficulty" and that "people are feeling depressed.

"After so many years," he said, speaking of the Golden Dawn, "they came back again. This is very bad for all of us." He praised the prime minister's speech and said that a combination of education and tough laws against Holocaust denial were the best way to combat the neo-Nazi extremists.

"We are not alone," he added. "We have Israel. Why should a small community be afraid?"

Argentine Jews mark embassy bombing

JTA

BUENOS AIRES — The Jewish community here commemorated the 21st anniversary of a deadly attack on the city's Israeli embassy.

Nearly 1,500 people participated in the March 17 demonstration organized by the embassy to mark the attack, which Argentina and Israel blame on Iran.

On the afternoon of March 17, 1992, a suicide bomber drove a truck loaded with explosives into the front of the embassy, killing 29 and injuring 242.

Sunday's rally also protested the memorandum of understanding signed recently between Argentina and Iran on a joint investigation of the 1994 attack on the AMIA Jewish community centre in Buenos Aires. Over Jewish community protests, Argentina's congress last month approved the agreement.

The attack, which killed 85 and injured hundreds, is believed to have been carried out under orders from Tehran. Six Iranians are wanted by Interpol in connection with the bombing, including Iranian Defence Minister Ahmad Vahidi.

Maria Eugenia Vidal, vice-chief of the Buenos Aires city government, told the crowd on Sunday, "The bomb exploded in the centre of Buenos Aires, in the middle of the heart of all Argentines."

AMIA President Guillermo Borger told JTA that the number of demonstrators this year was higher than in previous commemorations, in part because people wanted to express their opposition to the agreement with Iran.

U.S. Ambassador to Argentina Vilma Martinez also attended the demonstration. No high-ranking members of Argentina's national government participated.

In related news, Interpol will not lift the arrest warrants for Iranians suspected of involvement in the AMIA bombing, despite Tehran's supposed co-operation with Argentina in investigating the event.

Argentine Foreign Minister Hector Timerman cited a letter from the international police organization during a news conference on March 15 in explaining that the arrest warrants would remain active. Six Iranians are wanted by Interpol in connection with the bombing, including Iranian Defence Minister Ahmad Vahidi.

"Some organizations from the [Jewish] community said that the agreement with Iran is a step to the precipice," Timerman said. "But this document from Interpol shows that the government is always working for the justice, the memory and the truth."

A banner in an urban square dedicated to peace in Rosario, Argentina, commemorates the bombings of the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires and the bombing of the AMIA Jewish community centre. The banner shows a sum 22 + 85 (the number of deceased in each bombing) and the result, 6,000,107, a reference to the number of Jews killed in the Holocaust. The photo was taken in March 2006.

Family clothing business closing after 55 years

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

When Martin and Judith Markus started their retail clothing business on Bloor Street West, Louis St. Laurent was still Prime Minister of Canada and Dwight Eisenhower was president of the United States.

The neighbourhood was a lot different back then, home to many European immigrants, just like the Markuses.

Business was brisk and would get even brisker as the years went by and the company entered its retail heyday in the 1980s and '90s. But time stops for no one. Since then business has decreased steadily, Martin is 93, Judith 10 years younger and though their middle-aged kids, Norman and Linda, have spent years in the store, early next month N. Markus Fashions will close its doors for the final time.

Before the family shutters the store, they are planning a customer appreciation weekend from April 5-7. "It would be wonderful to have the opportunity to thank and say goodbye to as many of our customers and Toronto residents as possible who, over the span of many years, have come to our store to find the right outfit for all the various family events," daughter Linda Friedman, stated.

While for Martin the closing is a particularly sad event – "I built it up from nothing, from nowhere," he said wistfully – they did have a good, long run in the business.

The Markus family story is not atypical for postwar immigrants. Martin and Judith were both born in Transylvania, Judith in a small village, Martin in Satu Mare.

They met in Toronto – in itself a happy confluence of events. When Martin came to Canada in 1948, he arrived in Halifax by ship and was supposed to continue to Montreal. "However, he heard a conductor saying, 'Toronto train now boarding!' He liked the sound of the city's name and decided to board that train," Friedman said.

Judith had already come to Toronto as a domestic. They met and in 1950 were married. Martin worked for a time in Judith's father's coat manufacturing company, but he wanted to strike out on his own. With their knowledge of the clothing business, they opened their first store at 602 Bloor St. W. In 1976, they opened their current location at 592 Bloor. They've been on the same block, just a little west of Bathurst, for 55, nearly 56 years.

There was no secret to their success. It entailed long hours, hard work, personalized service and good prices. Martin would take the bus from their home in North York at 7 a.m. and visit suppliers before he opened the store. He built solid personal relationships with them and was able to leverage that into good prices. Plus, he became pretty adept at finding the merchandise that would sell, Judith said.

"I had a magic feeling" about their goods, Martin said. Sometimes customers would see them unpacking boxes of apparel and would buy the clothes even before he'd have a chance to put a price tag on them, he said.

Like themselves, many of their customers were European immigrants who struggled with English. One lady, Martin recalled, knew only a few words. "How much?" she would ask about an item she liked. "Too much," she said, even before he had a chance to answer, he recalled.

"Ninety per cent of the customers were newcomers," Martin said. "We got a very good name. One told another one the good things about us."

Back in the early days, customers liked to spend time and talk, Judith recalled. Some have been repeat customers for 20 or 30 years.

"Customers had pleasure from our store, the prices and the selection," Martin continued. "I carried a big stock always."

Back when the dollar went a lot further, some customers would spend $1,500, even $2,000 on clothing.

The Markus family will be closing the door of their clothing store next month. Seen here, from left, are Norman Markus, his parents Judith and Martin, and sister Linda Friedman.

Some even bought at the store's low prices and then re-sold the same merchandise out of their homes in Scarborough, Martin said, shaking his head.

Norman and Linda were at the store a lot. As kids, they'd hang around and on weekends, they'd be given money for the movies. They'd walk over to the nearby Alhambra Theatre or the Midtown Theatre (the Bloor Hot Docs Cinema today).

When they got older, they began working in the store, Linda in the children's wear section.

"It's in our blood," said Norman. "You couldn't not help. There's a lot of history here.

"One of the strengths is that my father was loved by all the suppliers, so he could wheel and deal a lot with them for price point. That's why we could compete," he said.

The family won't reveal exactly how much they earned. All Judith will say is, "It was a good, good business."

At one point they were offered a place in the new, yet to open Yorkdale Mall, but they turned it down. They didn't want to be dictated to about the store, its hours of operations and other items. "I knew [Martin] would have to be there all the time and I didn't want him to be a slave to the store," Judith said.

Since then, "the nature of retail has changed significantly," said Friedman. "With the onset of big box stores, online shopping and the changing demographic nature of the area, with fewer European immigrants and more from Asia, business hasn't kept up."

Norman said closing is the result of two factors: "financial and my health."

Sales are down 75 per cent from the peak some 25 years ago. The trend is not encouraging, and Norman is concerned that worries over the bottom line will affect his health.

Judith and Martin have lots of grandchildren, but they're busy pursuing their own careers and none are interested in taking over the family business. So, some time in April, after they've paid their respects to their devoted clientele, N. Markus Fashions will close for the last time.

Nevertheless, the Markus family will retain a connection to Bloor Street. They own the building and have a couple of tenants living above the shop. As for a prospective retail tenant, they don't have one just yet. Hopefully, said Judith, it will be someone in the clothing business.

Six Canadian comedians walk into a bar…

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

During the 2009 Toronto International Film Festival, Yuk Yuk's founder Mark Breslin was angry over the anti-Israel protests that stemmed from the festival's spotlight on Israeli films.

He wondered what would happen if he brought a group of Israeli comedians to Yuk Yuk's. Would they picket him?

Although that idea didn't come to fruition, the Israeli Consulate in Toronto recommended instead that he take a group of Canadian comedians on a tour of Israel.

So last June Breslin took a group of six Canadian comedians – only two of them Jewish – for a week of performances in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv.

The experience was filmed by Torontonian Igal Hecht, and the resulting documentary, A Universal Language, will have its première at next month's Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

"The film explores this uncompromising, uncensored tour of Canadian comics in which they put on comedy shows for Jews and Arabs and anyone who would come, and share some really good laughs with people by telling very, very, dirty jokes," Hecht explains.

The tour got off to a rocky start. The first show was at a community centre in Jerusalem. Most of the guests were, as one comedian put it in the film, "Old people and their parents."

"The comedians were really freaking out," Hecht says. "This wasn't their audience."

The show went on as planned. For the most part, the comedians kept their usual filthy acts and, though some people walked out, in the end it was a success.

"That first night there was a woman with a walker," Hecht recalls. "Although she laughed and stayed till the very end."

But that was nothing compared to what was to come later at a hotel in East Jerusalem. This time, the guests included mostly Palestinians and North American NGOs. The problem was when the comedians used the word "Israel" in their acts. Some comedians got heckled. "Learn your history," one shouted. Other guests walked out.

But as Hecht points out, sadly, the problem wasn't with the Palestinians. It was the Canadians. "The Palestinians there were very warm and receptive to the comedians. It was a lot of the Canadian and American NGOs there that were leading the charge. There's a line in the film where Jean Paul [one of the

The reclusive Philip Roth opens up in PBS documentary

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The great Jewish American novelist Philip Roth tends to be reclusive and rarely grants interviews. But in a revealing PBS documentary from the American Masters series, Philip Roth: Unmasked, due to be broadcast on March 29 at 9 p.m., he displays a loquacious side.

For reasons that remain undisclosed, Roth – the recipient of the Pulitzer Prize and twice winner of the National Book Award – gave filmmakers Livia Manera and William Karel unprecedented access. Over 12 hours during a 10-day period, he reflected on his life and career in what is billed as the first biopic on Roth.

Happily enough, Roth, who marked his 80th birthday on March 19, is open and lucid.

Better still, his observations, at once serious and funny, are supplemented by perceptive comments from critic Claudia Pierpont, a staff writer at the New Yorker; the novelists Nicole Krauss, Jonathan Franzen and Nathan Englander, and a procession of Roth's friends.

With 31 novels and collections of short stories to his credit, Roth is a veritable writing machine. But as he admits toward the close of this 90-minute film, he never fails to wonder, at least between books, whether he can pull it off yet again.

Flitting between an Upper West Side apartment in Manhattan and a cottage in rural Connecticut, Roth works constantly, standing as he writes. He claims that the only reader who counts is himself, but that is not entirely true. Upon completion of a manuscript, he submits copies to trusted friends for input.

Roth, whose novels grapple with moral struggle and moral ambiguity, as Krauss points out, does not just tap into his formidable powers of imagination. Likening himself to a journalist, a comparison most creative writers would eschew, Roth says he often relies on news stories, past and present, for inspiration.

He candidly discusses the sexuality in his novels, but acknowledges that the escapades he describes so luridly and hilariously are not necessarily based on real experiences.

The film unfolds in chronological order after a heated denial by Roth that he is a "Jewish" writer. "I don't write Jewish," he declares indignantly, describing himself as an "American" writer.

He denies being a self-hating Jew or an antisemite, which some critics claimed he was following the publication of Goodbye, Columbus (1959), a book that gained him national attention.

As Pierpont says, Roth launched his career by drawing on his childhood in Newark, N.J., where he was born in 1933. He was the son of middle-class Jews, but his grandfather was an immigrant from Eastern Europe who spoke only Yiddish. Roth's father, whom he calls "a terrific pain in the ass," expected him to be a lawyer. However, Roth had his sights set on literature.

Although there were few books in his household, Roth began to read at the age of 12, and the Irish novelist James Joyce was one of his most formative influences. "That changed everything," he muses.

Desperately seeking to assert his independence, he left Newark at 16 to attend university. "I just wanted to get the hell away," he says.

At university, Roth turned to writing, but he dismisses his early stories. He began writing in earnest while in the army, and Franzen claims he became "the central figure" in his novels, which range from American Pastoral to The Human Stain.

There were bumps on the road. As a result of a "brutal and lurid" marriage, he developed a writer's block and his self-confidence fell away. Cured by the balm of psychoanalysis, Roth wrote the ribald bestseller, Portnoy's Complaint (1969).

As he mischievously recalls, he had to "prepare" his parents for its publication. True to his prediction, it was immensely popular. "Suddenly, I had money," he says. Buoyed by its success, he bought his first car and house and sent his parents on a cruise.

Given his advanced age, he dwells on the spectre of death.

A painful back ailment prompted him to contemplate suicide, he admits.

Philip Roth

The topic induces Roth to discuss the panoply of famous novelists who've committed suicide.

The prospect of death generates fear and sadness, but not rage, in him. "Time is running out," he says in a tone of resignation.

Quickly regaining his composure, he suggests that he is good and ready for his rendezvous with mortality.

Whenever he leaves this vale of tears, Roth can take solace from the fact that he has truly lived life to the full.

Comedians moved by Israeli experience comedians, who is black) says, 'I wish white people would stop being offended on behalf of other people,' and he's right," Hecht says.

"These NGOs come there and have one specific way of looking at things, and anything else, even a comedy show, offends them. Once those people left, the show went very well."

As Breslin says in the movie, "one thing I've learned is I won't be opening up a Yuk Yuk's in east Jerusalem."

Despite some early setbacks, the tour went over well. The comedians toured Israel and incorporated some of their observations during their acts.

"Comedians are very, very smart. They look at the world very different than most people do," Hecht says. "I also found they like to drink. You'd be surprised what you can find on a Friday night in Jerusalem at 3 a.m."

The comedians were also visibly moved by the experience, especially Aaron Berg.

"Aaron really re-connected with his Jewish roots. He really started thinking about his Jewish identity and I think now goes to a synagogue which he didn't do before."

The film also shows a scene of another comedian, Sam Easton, crying outside Yad Vashem. It turned out that although he isn't Jewish, his grandfather was and his whole family died during the Holocaust.

"Sam was really moved by it," Hecht says. "That scene was an honest moment that was only brought on by the trip. It all came to the surface by coming to Yad Vashem. He was really emotionally impacted by that."

Several local Palestinian and Jewish comedians are also featured in the film, which makes observations on the differences between Israeli and Canadian comedy.

"I think Israelis don't want to talk about politics most of the time in comedy because they talk about it all the time in their lives. Israeli comedy is more about punch lines and making fun of people's backgrounds, whereas North American comedy is more about telling a story and making observations about mundane things," Hecht says.

A Universal Language is a bit of a departure for Hecht, who's developed a name for himself making controversial/political films such as The Hilltops, My Flag and Shunned for his company Chutzpa Productions.

"Of all the films I've filmed in Israel over the last 10 years, this was the most fun," he said. "It's not stressful, and you're not thinking of who's going to shoot me and things along those lines."

Hecht says it's been about four years since he's made a political film and will return to what he calls his "traditional Chutzpa roots" for his next few films.

"They will be provocative and political, not so much about Israel and the Palestinians but more about major issues in the Jewish world."

Hecht will miss the première of A Universal Language because he's filming in Israel, but Breslin and several of the comedians will be there.

A shorter version of A Universal Language will also air on CBC's Documentary Channel on April 18 at 9 p.m.

TJFF (www.tjff.ca) screening times have not been released at time of writing.

A new view of old poems of Lodz and beyond

Reviewed by

Norman Ravvin

Early responses to the events of the World War II can carry an uncanny charge. Though they are far from us as readers or viewers, they have the power to recover responses that are fresh and new to our way of thinking.

The 1960 film Chronique d'un été, which is characterized as the first example of cinema verité, carries this charge. Among the young Parisians the director interviews in response to the question, "Are you happy?" is a young camp survivor named Marceline. Late in the film she appears on a remarkably carless Place de la Concorde, where she remembers aloud her feelings, and her father's response to them, as their family was caught up in the deportation engineered for the Germans by French military police.

A similar charge – via a voice unencumbered by familiar phrases and ideas – can be found in the poems collected in Exile at Last: Selected Poems, the recently published volume of selected work by the Yiddish writer Chava Rosenfarb (Guernica Editions). Edited by Rosenfarb's daughter, the scholar and translator Goldie Morgentaler, Exile at Last includes poems gathered from Rosenfarb's earliest publication, the 1947 collection Di balade fun nekhtikn vald, from postwar publications, and, as well, poems that have not been published before.

Rosenfarb carried her earliest poems with her from the Lodz Ghetto, where she was trapped with her family, to Auschwitz, where her writings were taken from her. In a process of reconstruction begun in a German work camp, and then completed after the war in Belgium, she rewrote her early lost works.

Like so much of Rosenfarb's writing, this places a poem like Isaac's Dream – a rendering of the hideous period known in the ghetto as the Sperre, in which 6,000 children were taken from their parents and sent to the death camp at Chelmno – in a remarkable, possibly unique context. In the Yiddish original, a note attached to the poem describes it as having been written on a Thursday, the sixth of September, in the midst of the days-long roundup.

It introduces a theme that recurs in Rosenfarb's postwar work – the emptiness, or, at least, childlike quality of biblical stories in light of the horrors the author has seen. Writing to her imaginary Isaac, Rosenfarb informs him: "'Hide yourself in the Bible's fairytale land./ For your God himself walks with me and my father,/ Right now, to the altar; with us – to His end.'"

Rosenfarb holds onto characters and motifs from biblical stories, turning them to her particular ends. In Rachel and Leah, the wives of Jacob become symbolic compatriots of the Jews of Lodz:

Rachel plays on the mandolin
And Leah plays on the flute.
Between the two women, the Shekhina is smiling.
She now knows how each life will conclude.

Among the ghetto poems, too, are portraits, intimate, lovely and sad, of the poet's life while imprisoned by the Germans in the poorest district of her hometown:

Bats fly past the window.
Wings flutter. Dancing specters.
The sun is gone.
In the western sky
the remains of its disarrayed bed
Still warm from its body.
On purple sheets and torn pillows lies the day and remembers.
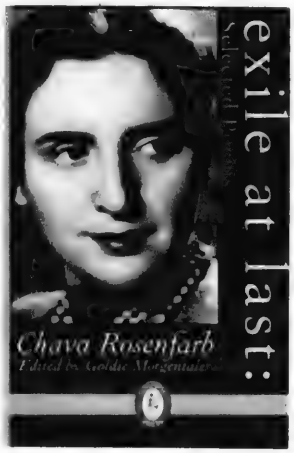
Soon it will be gone.



Exile at Last includes an introduction that Rosenfarb wrote in English in the early 1970s, when she was translating her poems into the language of her new home. It offers an intriguing portrait of a writer who acknowledges Canada's "magnificent air of freedom," but does "not feel at home." Rather, she is burdened by a feeling of "alienation" that she feels might be cured by her efforts at translating her Yiddish poetry for North American readers.

"I write," she asserts, "not only from the experience of being Jewish, but also from the experience of being a woman in this turbulent century." This latter theme runs through poems dedicated to describing motherhood and its challenges to a writing life: "Today my best poem's a child./ My silence sings brighter than words." In another rendering of this theme:

Children, you're my poems,
moulded to the shape of bodies, hummed into the lines of lips and sung into the forms of earlobes.

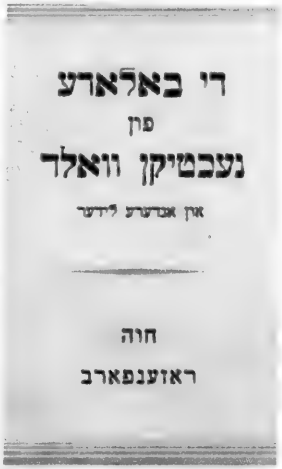
In light of such work, Morgentaler's commitment, as translator and editor of her mother's writing, is a final chapter in the remarkable narrative of loss and recovery, of endangerment and dedication to work that underwrites Rosenfarb's career. One feels keenly the life of the poems, the ill fortune and collaborative effort that allowed them to come down to us as readers.



Original 1947 Yiddish poetry publication by Chava Rosenfarb

Exile at Last cannot be expected to convey all the particulars of this story, some of which are bound up in the original Yiddish of the poems, and in their earliest publication by Yiddish-language publishers after the war. In the 1947 London edition of Di balade fun nekhtikn vald, Rosenfarb reminds her readers and herself that the German order that Jewish Lodzers enter the ghetto arrived on the eve of her birthday. The writer is in her 20s as she writes this, but the scale of her historical experience is already both a great burden and a source of writerly motivation.

Norman Ravvin's most recent publications include the novel, The Joyful Child (Gaspereau Press), and Failure's Opposite: Listening to A.M. Klein, co-edited with Sherry Simon. He is at work on a conference, to be held in Lodz, Poland, which will consider Canadian, Jewish and Polish culture.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Winnipeg welcomes young Israeli pucksters

Myron Love
Prairies Corespondent

WINNIPEG — Mike Mazeika fondly remembers the road trips that he took as a professional hockey player.

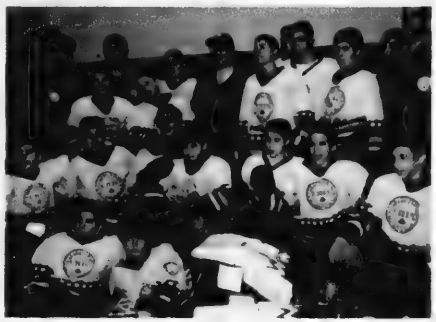
"As a hockey player, I made some of my best friends through bonding on road trips," the former Torontonian said.

That's what happened with his charges, as 17 young Israeli skaters on a road trip of a lifetime spent a week in Winnipeg March 12 to 19 at a special hockey camp funded by Toronto's Sid Greenberg, president of Astral Media.

All of them are students at the Canada Israel Hockey School, which is housed in the Canada Centre in Metullah in the very north of Israel. The Canada Centre is the only ice rink in the Jewish state.

The group of 11- and 14-year-olds included 10 Jewish kids and seven more from the Arab or Druze communities.

"This has been great for the kids," Mazeika said. "It's similar to a hockey team being on a road trip. We are seeing these kids bonding and becoming friends, no matter whether they are Jewish or Arab. And their parents have also gotten to know each other through hockey."



Israeli youngsters attend a hockey camp in Winnipeg.

The young Israeli hockey players and three coaches were flown to Winnipeg for a week-long hockey camp at the MTS IcePlex. The visit was co-ordinated by the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and the Winnipeg Chapter of Canadian Friends of Hebrew University.

"This is the first time that any of these kids has been in Winnipeg," Mazeika said. "They thought the snow was the greatest thing ever and were amazed to see people skating on the river."

Mazeika, who is originally from Toronto and has been coaching in Israel for the past year, said there are more than 400 Israeli kids involved in the Canada Israel Hockey School program.

While most live in northern Israel, some live as far away as the Tel Aviv area and Be'er Sheva. The skaters who came to Winnipeg were chosen based on their passion for the game and their exemplary behaviour.

"The kids were wonderful," said Ara Morris, principal of Brock Corydon School. Several Brock Corydon Hebrew bilingual program families – including Morris' – opened their homes to the visiting Israelis during their stay.

"We hosted two of them," she said.

"The welcome we received from the Brock Corydon School parents was unbelievable," Mazeika said. "They made us feel like Winnipeggers."

While they were here, the visiting Israelis took part in daily morning hockey practices at the IcePlex. Off the ice, they and their host families spent time playing miniature golf and glow bowling, as well as shopping, curling, visiting the Manitoba Museum and hanging out at the Rady Jewish Community Centre.

The highlight of the Israeli hockey players' time in Winnipeg was a March 17 exhibition game at the IcePlex against the Corydon Comets Minor Peewee A3 team.

DJ Schneeweiss, Israel's consul general to Toronto and Western Canada, conducted the opening faceoff as part of his first visit to Winnipeg.

The visitors kept the game close for two periods, but the home team gained the upper hand in the third and skated away with a 5-2 victory.

Afterward, in the dressing room, coach Mazeika praised his players' efforts, emphasizing that they had only been playing with each other for a few weeks and their opponents had been together for four years.

"Having their host families at the game to cheer them on made them feel like heroes," Mazeika said.

The Israelis' visit concluded with a farewell dinner March 18 at the Asper Jewish Community Campus.

"We would love to come back here next year," Mazeika said.

Usher and the Blue Raiders win Ontario championship

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

When Sage Usher enrolled at St. Michael's College School a couple of years ago, he was a little unsure about the whole Jew-in-the-Roman-Catholic-school thing.

He'd been bar mitzvahed in Israel and came from a line of proud Jewish athletes.

It turns out, the religious aspect of the school curriculum was a take it or leave it proposition – which he left – and he was able to concentrate on the main reason he was there in the first place, playing basketball.

It's a game he's been pretty good at for a number of years and earlier this month, he helped the school's Varsity Blue Raiders cap off a 47-2 season with a 47-38 overtime win against their arch rivals, Father Henry Carr Crusaders, to capture the OFSAA gold medal.

"It was close," Usher said of the final, which left the Blue Raiders tops in Canada among high schools. "They were leading for most of the game. We took the lead in the fourth" but Henry Carr sunk a couple of threes in the final minute to send it to extra time. They attempted a "Hail Mary" buzzer-beater, but it was an air ball that missed the basket completely but which frayed a lot of nerves on the court. "It was a nail-biter," Usher said.

In OT the Blue Raiders shut the door tight; all season long, the team had worked on its defence and it paid off in extra time, when they denied their rivals even a single point.

Usher won't say the final was pre-ordained, but all year long Henry Carr was the only team in Canada that really gave them any trouble. During their earlier matchup at the St. Michael's/Nike 53rd Annual Tournament, St. Mike's was down 16 to Henry Carr, "but we came back to win," Usher said.

"It was meant to be, to play them in the final," he added.

The Blue Raiders have been one of the city's best teams for a while, but it was a mid-winter tournament in Florida that really gave the guys confidence for the season, Usher said.

The Blue Raiders aheaded down to Orlando to participate in the Great Florida Shootout, an event that attracted teams from Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Tennessee and themselves.

They knocked off some pretty good teams and ended up losing to a team from Atlanta in the final, Usher said. "That gave us a lot of confidence the rest of the year. We knew we could compete with anybody after that."

The Blue Raiders are loaded with basketball talent, he explained. There are so many good players that the coach changes players much like they do in hockey, rolling two lines of five.

As for himself, as a six-foot-three shooting guard, Usher can boast a pretty good three-point shooting percentage; he also attributes his success to his knowledge of the game, "playing in the flow of the game," (not forcing anything, making safe plays) and his competitive spirit.

Prior to enrolling at St. Mike's, he attended Crescent School where as a Grade 9 student, he was asked to play on the varsity team with kids in Grades 11 and 12.

Even before that, in Grade 8, he played for the BJCC Blue Devils (apparently recruiting a Blue Devil was not against St. Mike's policy). Last year, that team finished fifth in the province among rep teams.

Though his high school season may now be over, basketball continues. This summer, he'll be part of the under-19 Canadian team at the Maccabiah Games in Israel. He's hoping to complete something his zaide, David Usher, couldn't. David had been named to the Maccabiah wrestling team, but for financial reasons, the team was not able to participate.

Sage's dad, Martin, had attended the opening ceremonies at the Maccabiah Games and he described the pageantry and the atmosphere of the event – in which athletes from around the world march into a packed stadium – as "amazing," Sage said.

Those stories were big motivators for him to try out for the team. "That's the reason you want to go," he said. "It's the way they talked about it."

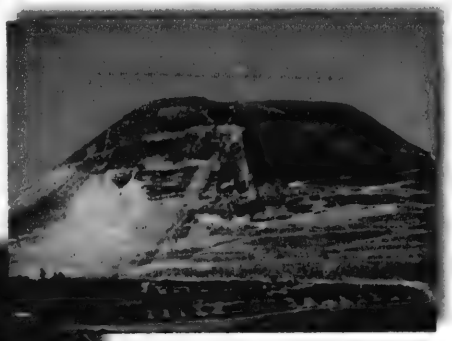
King Herod's palace recreated for Jerusalem exhibit

Howie Osterer
Special to The CJN

The model of Herod's tomb



Herodium as seen from the ground

Herodium as seen from the air

The Royal Room at the theatre

JERUSALEM — It would be an understatement to say that King Herod's place in Jewish history is ambiguous.

Reviled for his cruel, harsh domestic policies, distrusted for his close affiliation with the Romans and seen as inauthentic because of his Idumean background, the Judeans did not much like him despite the relative economic prosperity he helped bring about at the time. Herod was feared and hated by the people of Judea, and respected and admired by his Roman overlords, and even by others who marvelled at the acuity of his esthetic, architectural vision.

He was a ruler on a grand scale and was responsible for vast building programs and majestic architectural structures in Judea, which at the time was but a tiny province in Rome's quite large and expansive empire.

A sense of who the Idumean King of Judea was is now on display at the Israel Museum in Jerusalem in a newly installed exhibition called Herod the Great: The King's Final Journey.

The exhibit opened on Feb. 12 and is attracting wide international interest and attention. The scale, pageantry and pomp of Herodium, the king's palace just south of Jerusalem, have been recreated in part for the world to see. So, too, is his final resting place, the massive mausoleum there.

Herodium is located some 12 kilometres south of Jerusalem on the edge of the Judean Desert. It was built by Herod to commemorate his decisive victory over the Parthians and their alliance with Antigonus, Herod's Hasmonean opponent, in 40 BCE. It housed a massive administrative centre, palace, fortress, theatre, sport complex and his final resting place.

Hebrew University of Jerusalem archeologist, Prof. Ehud Netzer, spent some 40 years exploring the site and eventually, in 2007, made a breakthrough discovery of Herod's tomb, an 80-foot tower-shaped mausoleum.

More than 250 artifacts, weighing some 30 tons, were collected by Netzer's team and are now on display at the Israel Museum, curated by David Mevorah, Silvia Rozenberg and Rodney Soher.

The doors of the exhibition open onto a replica setting of the calm Judean desert and from there into a series of chambers highlighting the world in which Herod lived and many of his accomplishments during his 33-year reign.

According to the museum, Herod the Great: The King's Final Journey seeks to provide a better understanding of this ancient figure through the monumental architecture he created and the art and objects with which he surrounded himself. The exhibition examines Herod's remarkable building projects, complex diplomatic relations with the Roman emperors and nobility, and dramatic funeral procession from Jericho to the mausoleum he constructed for himself in Herodium. A striking reconstruction of the burial chamber of the mausoleum is a centrepiece of the exhibition."

Herod had a penchant for the lavish and the opulent. A sampling of his tastes is on display in the exhibit: mosaic floors, painted frescoes, heated rooms, running water, sumptuous baths, statues, busts of Roman emperors and paintings. There is even a royal room – a VIP box – to the theatre on the premises.

He emulated the Roman Emperor Augustus Caesar and ensured that all of his palaces enjoyed the same level of luxury as those of Caesar. Mosaic floors carpeted many of his rooms.

The gathering and display of Netzer's findings is a breathtaking view of a person who was at the centre of events in Judea at one of the most critical periods of the development of western civilization.

Tragically, Netzer did not live to see the public presentation of his life's work. He died after a fall while working at the site in October 2010. The exhibition is dedicated to his memory.

The exhibit runs until Oct. 5, 2013.

Israel treats wounded Syrians

Israeli soldiers provided medical care to four wounded Syrians on the Golan Heights border. The Syrians approached the border on March 20 and were treated near the fence there, the Israel Defence Forces said in a statement. Two of the Syrians were taken to Israeli hospitals because of the severity of their injuries, according to the IDF. They will be returned to Syria following their treatment. The less severely injured Syrians will be returned to Syria "later on," the IDF statement said. Seven Syrian rebels entered Israel through the Golan Heights in February and were treated in Israeli hospitals. Six were quietly repatriated at an undisclosed location for their own safety; one was very severely injured. Several Syrian mortar shells have struck Israeli territory in recent months as the civil war in Syria rages.

Were chemical weapons used?

A senior Israeli official said March 20 that it is "apparently clear" that chemical weapons were recently used in Syria. The statement by Yuval Steinitz, the newly appointed minister of intelligence and strategic affairs, conflicted with U.S. assessments that there is no evidence behind accusations traded the day before by Syrian rebels and the Bashar Assad regime that there was a chemical weapons attack in a village in the north of the country. Steinitz, who was speaking to Army Radio, did not say how he came to the conclusion that the weapons were used. He would not comment on whether it was Assad forces or the rebels that used them, saying it was not important.

Gazans fire rockets

At least four rockets were fired at southern Israel from Gaza last week during the visit of U.S. President Barack Obama. Two of the rockets fired March 21 landed in Sderot, damaging one home. The other two rockets missed their targets and are believed to have landed in Gaza. The attack came on the second day of Obama's three-day visit to Israel, and occurred hours before he travelled to Ramallah to meet with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. There was no claim of responsibility for the attack. It was the second rocket attack on southern Israel since an Egyptian-brokered truce ended the Gaza conflict, Israel's Pillar of Defense operation, in November, and the second in a month.

Erdogan explains statement

Turkish Prime Minister Tayyip Erdogan told a Danish newspaper that his recent comments calling Zionism a "crime against humanity" were misinterpreted. "Everyone should know that my criticism [is about] certain cases, particularly Gaza and the settlements, and directed against Israeli policy," Erdogan told Politieken via email, ahead of his visit to Denmark. "It is quite natural for us to continue to criticize Israel, as long as it has not abandoned its denial of the Palestinian state's right to exist. On the other hand, we have recognized and continue to recognize the Israeli state within the 1967 borders and on the basis of two-state solution." Erdogan's remarks at a UN conference last month triggered condemnations from Israel, the White House, UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon and European leaders. Erdogan said in Vienna, "Just as with Zionism, antisemitism and fascism, it has become impossible not to see Islamophobia as a crime against humanity."

Ex-Torontonian stars in breakout City hit

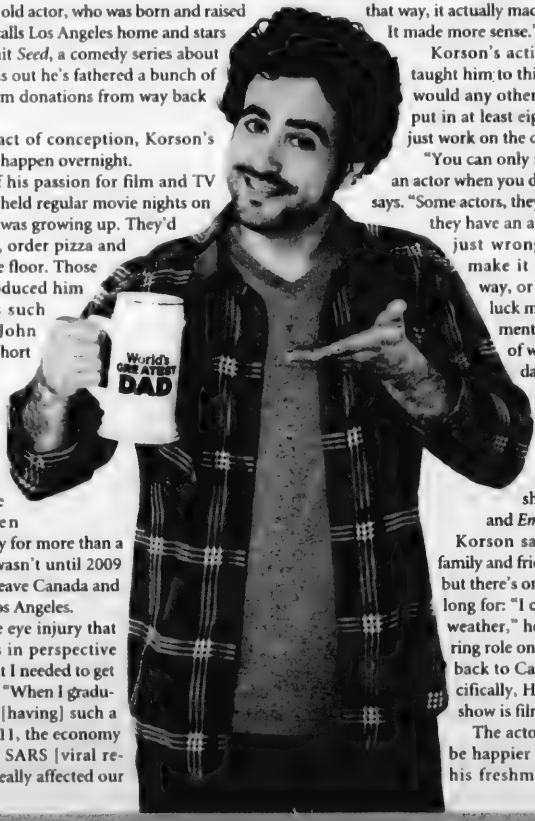
Ilan Mester
Special to The CJN

Adam Korson is proof that a lot can happen in five years. He last spoke to The CJN in 2008, when he was producing and appearing in local Toronto plays.

Now the 31-year-old actor, who was born and raised in Thornhill, Ont., calls Los Angeles home and stars in City's breakout hit Seed, a comedy series about a bachelor who finds out he's fathered a bunch of kids, thanks to sperm donations from way back when.

But unlike the act of conception, Korson's success story didn't happen overnight.

He owes a lot of his passion for film and TV to his parents, who held regular movie nights on Saturdays when he was growing up. They'd often rent a movie, order pizza and have a picnic on the floor. Those movie nights introduced him to comedy greats such as Steve Martin, John Candy and Martin Short at a very early age.



Korson honed his acting chops at Toronto's Randolph Academy and got his start in Toronto's theatre scene. He's been acting professionally for more than a decade. In fact, it wasn't until 2009 that he decided to leave Canada and take a gamble on Los Angeles.

"I had a massive eye injury that kind of put things in perspective and made clear what I needed to get done," Korson says. "When I graduated, Toronto was [having] such a tough time with 9/11, the economy was changing and SARS [viral respiratory disease] really affected our film industry. People were scared to come to Toronto. It came down to 'the moment is now.' And if this is my career – which I always knew it was – the passion and dedication was real and is real, then I had to go where the work was."

Unfortunately, the work didn't come to him right away. His dwindling bank account meant he had to live in his car in the beginning. Korson remembers brushing his teeth with a water bottle in the parking lot of Mel's Drive-In on Sunset Boulevard. But "I always had a positive outlook," says the actor. "That's the school of thought, and I guess that probably comes from the way my parents raised me."

He says that aside from the friends he met there, what helped him get through the challenges was thinking of himself as a business and realizing that new companies aren't profitable in their first year.

"So really, I started looking at myself as an actor at business," he says. "You know, I'm the CEO of my own company. And I'm also an employee, and I have all these different departments… And so when I put it in that way, it actually made the move easier. It made more sense."

Korson's acting coach in L.A. taught him to think of acting as he would any other job: you need to put in at least eight hours a day to just work on the craft.

"You can only really call yourself an actor when you do it every day," he says. "Some actors, they start acting when they have an audition and that's just wrong – you'll never make it if you do it that way, or you're betting on luck more so. And so the mentality that I had was of working on it every day."

After appearing in a number of plays in L.A., he eventually booked guest roles on the shows 2 Broke Girls and Emily Owens, M.D.

Korson says he misses his family and friends from Canada, but there's one thing he doesn't long for: "I can't say I miss the weather," he laughs. His starring role on Seed brought him back to Canada – more specifically, Halifax – where the show is filmed.

The actor says he couldn't be happier with the reaction his freshman series has received so far. "I've been thrilled," he says. "Everybody has been overwhelmingly positive, which is nice. Especially because when we were shooting the series, we fell in love with the story and with the characters and the situations – and fell in love with each other just putting it together. So the fact that people are responding in such a positive way towards it, I mean it's really all I've wanted was that kind of response."

Fans of the show have come to love Korson's character, Harry – even though he doesn't always do, or say, the right things. "When I read 'Harry' for the first time…I understood him. I got him," says Korson. "He says some things and he gets himself into situations. And a lot of times he gets into these situations and out of these situations by manipulating certain people and the situations themselves. But he does it from a purely no bad bone in his body – it's all heart."

Adam Korson stars in Seed. (City photos)

So what's next for Korson? The actor says he just wrapped up a guest stint on A&E's The Glades. He's also working on a website called Awkward Moments and Misunderstandings, which he's hoping to launch this April. "Every week you'll get new videos that will come up on that site, and people will be able to post their own awkward moments or misunderstandings."

Whether it is film, theatre or TV, Korson says he remains open to every acting medium. "For me at the end of the day, what's important is that I'm challenged."

Seed airs Mondays at 8:30 p.m. ET on City.

No do-overs

Dear Ella,

I have lost a lot of sleep and have been exceptionally stressed over the last few days. I said a horrible thing to a good friend, and I'd do anything to take it back. I fear I've lost her forever. Steph and I go way back, and although at times she can be annoying, I love her dearly. She has been by my side and my rock through some very challenging life events.

The other day, we were out together when I got a call from my overbearing stepmother, whom I have trouble standing up to. She told me that my dad and her would be coming into the city and to please clear my calendar for the weekend, because they have some important things to discuss. I automatically said yes, even though I had already booked a short getaway for some much needed rest and relaxation with Stephanie.

Ask Ella

By Ella Burakowski

After I hung up, Steph just stared at me, her head shaking and her mouth open. Before she could say a word, I jumped in first and yelled at her, "This is none of your business, so stay out of it." I knew as soon as I said it that I had screwed up. Steph turned and walked away without a word, and I haven't heard from her since. I'm so weak, I hate myself and I miss my best friend. Help!

Need a Do-Over

Dear Need a Do-Over,

Everyone has said or done something they wish they could take back. Life doesn't come with mulligans. But you don't have to let it eat you alive, either. You can be sure that Steph is not happy either, and more likely, she's hurt and angry. You must mitigate the damage. There's no easy way around this. You owe Stephanie big time for not only putting your needs above hers, but for dismissing her feelings so callously.

Clearly, you have issues with your stepmother, which you allowed to get in the way of your friendship, but what you also did is make your problems into Stephanie's problems, too. You not only ruined her vacation, but you chose your stepmother over her and then yelled at her as if it were her fault. You did that because you were angry and felt a loss of control in that situation.

Besides a sincere apology, you owe her an explanation, and you had better come clean and be honest with yourself first. Your behaviour was caused by fear of saying "no" to your stepmom. What made you react this way? Search out that answer and fix it. Promise Steph it will never happen again, and mean it. Actions speak louder than words. You will have to prove to Steph that you have identified the problem and offer her concrete proof that you're working on it. That, together with a heartfelt apology should be a good basis to begin to repair the damage.

Steph knows and loves you for who you are, so the two of you will get through this, but the ball's in your court to make the first move. It may be difficult, embarrassing and humbling, but you owe her nothing less.

People tend to forgive, but it's harder to make them forget. Too much time has passed already. Pick up the phone and make things right. Turn this situation into a positive life lesson. Go re-book your weekend with your best friend. It will give you time to talk and repair some of the damage.

CHAROSET PETIT FOURS

1½ c dried dates, pitted • ½ c yellow raisins • ¼ c dried apricots • 1 green apple, shredded • 3 tbls red wine • 1 tsp cinnamon • 1 c finely ground walnuts • ½ c finely shredded coconut

Place dried fruit in food processor fitted with metal blade. Add apple, wine, cinnamon. Puree until smooth, stopping and scraping down sides of processor as necessary. Scrape contents of bowl into container; cover and refrigerate a couple of hours until firm enough to roll into balls.

When ready to make petit fours, remove a small amount of mixture at a time, roll into bite-sized balls, then roll into nuts and/or coconut. Place each ball on a baking tray lined with parchment or directly into muffin liners. Once the balls are rolled and coated, place tray into freezer until ready to serve them.

Physician-assisted suicide

There are certain "hot-button" issues that evoke very strong reactions.

Among them are abortion, refusal and withdrawal of life-maintaining medical treatments, same-sex rights and, their ultimate expression, same-sex marriage. In some jurisdictions, the issue of whether health care should be public or private or mixed can be very emotionally provocative.

Looking at various jurisdictions around the world, one observes different approaches to some of these hot-button issues, at times belying perceived local values, politics or religious influences.

Senior Side of Life

Michael Gordon

For example, abortion is legal in France, Britain, Switzerland and Denmark, and it is also legal in countries with large populations of Roman Catholics, including Hungary, Romania and Italy. In Israel, abortion is legal, despite prohibitions against it among some Jewish groups.

In some countries, it is legal and fundable through the public health-care system. In Canada, following many challenges by the renowned (or infamous) abortion activist gynecologist, Henry Morgentaler, it is legal, even though some argue that it's not as readily available as it should be.

Among the very hot-button issues making headlines again in Canada is physician-assisted suicide (PAS), in which a physician, under strict parameters, can prescribe, for a capable patient, medications for the sole purpose of ending the patient's life, as long as she or he can self-administer it. This is in contrast to euthanasia, which is legal in the Netherlands and Belgium. There, a physician may legally and without prosecution end the life of a patient under strict legislated criteria. Some critics of these more permissive programs point to evidence of insufficient scrutiny and safeguards.

In Canada, the British Columbia Supreme Court ruled that Gloria Taylor, a women suffering from amyotrophic lateral sclerosis (ALS), should have the right to access PAS, as denying this right, in the Criminal Code "unjustifiably infringes the [Canadian Charter's] equality rights." Two months after the ruling, the federal government launched an appeal to overturn Taylor's exemption. However, British Columbia Court of Appeal's Justice Jo-Ann Prowse rejected that request. In a written decision, Prowse said that revoking Taylor's exemption would cause irreparable harm to Taylor, which outweighs the federal government's interests.

In the United States, only Oregon, Washington and Montana allow PAS. An Aug. 11, 2012, New York Times article, In Ill Doctor, A Surprise Reflection of Who Picks Assisted Suicide by Katie Hafner, Dr. Richard Wesley, a resident of Washington state who suffers from ALS, feels comfort in the knowledge that he has been given a prescription that he can take when he feels that he no longer wants to live with his illness or its symptoms, which he knows will occur in the disease's later stages.

The lines of controversy are again drawn. On one side are those who are opposed, often on religious grounds or the fear of the impending "slippery slope" argument, despite evidence from those jurisdictions that allow PAS, where there has not been a dramatic explosion of requests. On the other side are those who want to protect and promote patient autonomy to the point of allowing a PAS decision, with the necessary safeguards to avoid abuse by patients, families or physicians.

How this will play out in Canada is still not clear, but since the Sue Rodriguez case in 1994, when her PAS request was declined through the legal process, much has changed in public opinion and the law, and PAS may become more palatable in Canadian society.

At Passover we remember the struggles of our people.

Tova, a single mother, is struggling with a life-threatening illness. She relies on Na'amat's Tel Aviv Daycare for her daughter's care. The days that Tova has early morning treatments, she barely has the energy to cook dinner. The daycare often sends meals home.

Na'amat is giving Tova the strength and support she needs to persevere over her hardships.

In fact, Na'amat helps to give strength to tens of thousands of needy women and children each year. Won't you be a part of it?

From My Fear of the Shtarkeh to My Faith in Faith

By Alex Korn

So, I'm now wearing a kippah all the time.

It's a holy reminder of my sacred journey of healing from being an emotionally scarred child of Holocaust survivors to recently going to Germany for a physical healing and ultimately an emotional and spiritual healing as well.

I was born in 1942 near Alma Ata, in Kazakhstan, Russia, to my parents Lezer and Sara, may they be at peace. Both of them ran away from their homes in Poland leaving their families behind during the German invasion. All of my family, who stayed behind in Poland while believing in the basic goodness of man, was murdered by the Nazis and the lack of will to help Jews shown by most of the rest of the world. I know that I sound bitter and angry but as a child and as an adult, what I really felt was fear.

Fear of the insanity of humanity's astounding capability of inhumanity to each other—of the power of fear to instill fear in so many common folk and world leaders –that our people felt while being taken to their deaths confused and dazed by the civilized world's betrayal of us and all of humanity.

Me, I was frightened as a child of the Shtarkeh (the strong one). The big, strong, mindless, heartless, soulless, man with jackboots and the willingness and the ability to destroy anybody at will.

My younger lifetime was filled with constant nightmares.

When the Western world was threatened and it finally made political sense, the Americans got involved and as a united front, the world finally defeated the Nazi monsters.

We came to this magnificent country of Canada in 1948 and our family began our new life.

We forgot that just a short while ago Canada's policy was "none is too many" and recognized only that we were now really in the Goldeneh Medineh, the Golden Country, and a place where everybody could go and become a somebody.

My Dad was a shneider, a tailor and like so many other survivors, he and my mom went about creating a life starting out in Montreal and then on to Winnipeg, where my mother's sister, Lola, may she be at peace, lived.

Mr. Odwak, of blessed memory, was an angel who sponsored many Jews to come to Canada. He sponsored our family members, two sisters and their families, a brother and a cousin. As my parents slowly gathered the shreds of our families our family grew and prospered in our new Canadian home.

As we grew and prospered modestly and slowly "Good country Canada" became my father's motto.

Every Saturday night, the Greenies got together played cards and served up a little sponge cake, cookies, a shot of rye or two or more, all mixed with tearful stories of the old country, of the shtetls and of the family and friends who were no longer alive. Lots of tears mixed with some laughter and l'chaims.

With the years, the tears diminished greatly and were replaced by the laughter which was now fueled with growing families, bar mitzvahs, weddings, success in business and the most powerful decision of all, to rejoice in their new lives.

What amazing heroes these Greenies were to pick up whatever pieces were left and to build a life of purpose, love, passion, putting money in the pishkahs which fueled the hope for next year in Jerusalem, as well as laughter and joy at the gift of their lives being fully lived.

My fear dissolved along with my parents but I still hated the guttural sound of spoken German and the fear was still there.

I've always had an angel looking after me. As a child I always felt her presence and maybe even caught glimpses of her. She soothed me and gave me a safe place and even before I understood it, she brought me closer to God.

When you grow up with something, it becomes a part of you and for me; I had my ever-present fear and my always-available angel.

As an adult I recognized that it was my time to gather some tools so that I could live my life more consciously, so I read many books and took many courses. One of these courses was on feeling and reading energy that was given by a wonderful woman who after the class asked me if I wanted to have my energy read.

She told me that I had a guardian angel around me with an unusual name that started with a "B", it sounded like Been, no, it was Bina.

Bina was my mother's mother, my Bubbie Bina who was murdered in the Holocaust. It was so good to know who had been comforting me all of these years.

But, the hate mixed with fear of the Germans was still there until last year.

In June of 2012, I was diagnosed with prostate cancer, Stage 2, which meant that watchful waiting, the path of "you'll die before this cancer gets you," was not a viable option for me.

The panic created by the oncology doctors was primal and dropped me into a whole other emotional world. The doctors gave me treatment options between surgery and radiation and I had to make a choice between two difficult options.

From My Fear of the Shtarkeh to My Faith in Faith

I needed to breathe into this situation; I needed to pray to God for guidance, for strength, clarity, and discernment.

Slowly over a handful of weeks, I recognized through my wife Dorry's and my endless searching the Internet, interviewing doctors, and mostly being guided by God's angels to a prostate cancer support group called "Man to Man" where I met Sam and Ezra, as well as John, Phillip, Peter and Delbert. All of these men had chosen to go to Bad Aibling, Germany to Dr. Douwes' Klinik St George for a hyperthermia treatment. I now had a viable third option.

I heard, read and recognized that the two alternatives offered in Toronto of surgery and radiation were not for me.

The hyperthermia treatment at St. George uses radio waves, which creates high heat which destroys cancer because cancer can only live at normal body temperature. This one-week-long treatment is a very tolerable treatment that destroys the cancer but does no long-term damage and does not destroy the prostate or any other organs or surrounding tissue.

After reading, talking, praying, we decided to go ahead and I placed a phone call to Frederika in Germany and wired my money and we were booked to go three weeks later.

A day or two after committing, I woke up and thought, "My God, I am going to GERMANY to be healed"!!!

The immensity of this awareness startled me.

The closing of the circle was a few weeks away. The healing of my inner child, of making peace within myself, the curing of the cancer within me all coalesced into this perfect moment of healing that I believe God created for me.

I went into my prayer, meditation room in my home and I put on my kippah, tallit, and tfillin and I gave thanks.

I gave thanks to God for all the angels who had guided me to this moment.

Dorry and I arrived in Bad Aibling, a quaint little town set in a bucolic setting surrounded by green hills and a river flowing through it. We settled in at Klinik St George, which was a former hotel and everything started the next morning. The Klinik treats up to four men with contained prostate cancer per week and this week there were three of us there with our wives, Ben and Sylvia and Ron and Wilma and Dorry and I. We became fast friends supporting each other, sharing meals, and taking walks through Bad Aibling.

The evening before my first heat treatment I prayed for a fully successful healing process and I also meditated on everything that had brought me to this point in my life. I now committed to wearing my kippah full time. It was important for me to maintain my awareness of God with me at all times and to celebrate my being a Jew.

I started my day with prayers as I do every morning and then went to the room where Dr. Douwes was ready to perform the first of the two heat treatments.

I told him about my need and desire to wear my kippah this morning to bring God into the room. I also told him about my being a child of Holocaust survivors and he said that he had heard this story many times in the 25 years his Klinik has been operating and that this was a new Germany and that the German people have taken responsibility for their past.

Healing comes when we recognize a problem, take responsibility of it and then take action to correct it.

This healing was a 70-year process for me.

There is so much wisdom in our Judaism that speaks to me such as: "Do not bow down to another man, only to God"; "God said that in order to elevate you, have I come to you;" "The urge towards good and evil is ever present"; "We must have and create joy in our lives"; among many more.

For me to bow down forever to the fearful ugly side of humanity is a sin. It sucks the joy out of life and denies the magnificence of light, love and God to shine through and fill my life.

To build a new life, it is important to come to some kind of peace with the old life. To forgive, but not to forget, to let go of the darkness of evil and step into the grandeur of living life to the fullest is the ultimate goal.

Shalom is a wonderful word because it means goodbye, hello as well as peace. Using this Shalom continuum, I said goodbye to the fear and I proudly said hello to my being a Jew and attained a level of peace that I have desired my whole life.

Echoes of Life

By David Benjamin

Odd, it was only 2:15, early afternoon and the lock was being turned. Yes, odd she thought because he always arrived precisely at 6:15, perhaps 6:20 if the weather was particularly nasty. And odd because the key turned slowly, tentatively, almost reluctantly. But it did finally turn, and her husband shuffled in.

There was no doubt it was her husband as she could always feel his presence. Indeed, after over 40 years of marriage, they felt their own wholeness only when they were together. It was a closeness that came more from familiarity than intimacy, more from the grind of everyday life than exalted memories, more from duty than joy. Yet, they were grateful for the tangled roots that had become their marriage. It gave them strength to endure, to live - a strength that had slowly grown into a determination that surprised them.

It wasn't always so. Before the war, they each had been happily married with large families of their own but the war had swallowed everything. There was no one left to hug, to laugh, to love. They survived, but only in the shadows of what had been such full and hopeful lives. Lost, as strangers, they had found each other after the war, and gradually each became the project for the other. If they could save one person, perhaps that was enough.

They married and immigrated to New York. In a desperate act of optimism they tried to bring new life into their broken world but their baby daughter was stillborn. Having barely stepped out of their own graves, they both recognized it had been an act of reckless, almost irresponsible hubris. How dare they think that they could create new life after all they had witnessed?

Now, she heard him hobble slowly across the thick carpets towards the living room.

Routine over time had become their protective armour, carefully insulating their lives. Outsiders might have called it suffocation. But, to them, change was the clear enemy, fraught with danger. It happened once, it could happen again. And his tiny uptown newsstand anchored his outside life. Stoically, he would stand on the sidewalk 10 hours every day, enveloped by the latest news, although he himself was safely planted back in 1938.

The shuffling in the living room continued until she heard him collapse into his armchair. His usual, familiar, and comforting presence was somehow different. No, it was more than different - it left her strangely chilled and darkly apprehensive. And now, instead of the usual click of the remote, there was only his laboured breathing.

As he fell into his chair he sighed; at least, he had made it home. That was a good first step. He could now breathe and, more importantly, think. It was too confusing. They had grown used to their tiny, somnolent, safe world. What would they do now?

In his mind, he began to replay the day. He had left his wife in bed as he did every day, walking the two miles in the early morning dampness to his stand. As usual, the unceremoniously dumped but familiar newspapers greeted him like old friends. He knew them well. The New York Times stood smugly to the side. The Wall Street Journal, the tallest pile, waited to be snatched by anxious traders. The Daily News boldly titillated. And then there were the foreign papers, ready to give disoriented tourists their fix of home.

He never read them. How could anything change his life? No, his life was firmly set in the past - the present was entirely superfluous. He had no need for political assassinations, terrorist attacks, and the constant drum of war. He had already seen far too much, no room for more.

Echoes of Life

As always he bent over, lifted and placed each pile in its place, cutting the straps to set them free. For a brief instant he had a strange thought; if only there were straps to cut him free. Yes, strange and a most unwelcomed thought – certainly, he had no need of saving? His life was neatly packaged, tightly bound by the strings of the past.

Other than this odd fleeting thought, the day started off like any other. The early morning rush passed, followed by the steady stream of tourists. The persistent din of traffic and frenetic New York life barely penetrated his world. He stood slightly smiling, warmly bathed, as always, in memories – memories so vivid he could smell, hear and taste his life before the war; his mother's salty herring, the tenderness of his family suppers, and the laughter of children – ah, children everywhere.

Then he heard something, a voice intruding into his sheltered world, but not any voice. The voice that had always echoed in his head was now outside. But how could it be? He instinctively backed up against the wooded wall of his stall. This voice was now all that he could hear. It moved closer. The voice laughed and played. There must have been other voices as well but he could only hear that one voice.

Then suddenly, the voice stood before him. There she was - the face of his first wife – as she was the last time they looked into each other's eyes in the camp, over 40 years ago. How could it be? The face smiled and asked if he had the Los Angeles Times? Confused, he had always been careful to separate his dreams from his reality. This was unfair!

The Los Angeles Times, she politely asked again. Yet she spoke English, not Yiddish. He shivered. Unsteady, he lowered himself on his stool. She rushed to help. The warmth of her hands on his arms felt familiar. The past and the present strangely merged.

He looked up and haltingly asked who she was, where she came from. She always had had a special affection for the old people from the old country. This newspaper peddler especially touched her. She was eager to share her story.

She patiently told him about being a very young child in a small Polish town, Jetel. The war had changed everything. Her entire family perished in the camps but she was saved by a German guard who smuggled her to safety. She continued and, as was her way, she spent most of her story recounting her rich and full life after the war. She was adopted by an American family in L.A. She bubbled as she described her wonderful four children, whom she had just brought to New York for a holiday.

Tears that had not flowed for years, that could not flow, welled up inside him. He looked up. "Hannah, Hannaleh", his lips moved but no sound escaped, "my sweet daughter".

The Primrose is My Shtetl

By B. Carolyn Peters

Today was like any other day. I woke up, put the kettle on, trudged to the washroom, and then back to the kitchen for my cup of tea. As I sat on the sofa, sipping the hot tea, I started thinking about how happy I felt this week. It wasn't the kind of "jump for joy" happy; it was just a nice, warm, mellow happy. It's the week before Passover.

I guess this feeling started when I offered to make the three gallons of chicken soup for the relatives, mishpachah and friends who will be at my cousin's seder. I had just finished cleaning the chickens when I realized that my largest pot would never be big enough, so I trotted down the hall to see if my dear friend, Matylda, had a large pot to lend me. Matylda's largest pot was already filled to the brim and bubbling away with ptcha. Matylda, always gracious, gave me her largest 'unemployed' pot and I trotted back down the hall to start my soup.

Then I started thinking that the greatest arbiter of Jewish cooking in the building, my friend Frances, would definitely have a big stock pot, since she had Shabbat dinners for her large, and ever-growing, family. So I trotted down the hall again; and knocked on Frances' door. With her usual warm welcome, Frances invited me inside for tea and her famous oatmeal chocolate chip cookies. Within seconds of telling her my chicken-soup dilemma, Frances produced the biggest enamel pot I have ever seen. Frances forewarned me about the discolouration on the inside; this yellow enamel pot had been stained from more than 50 years of family cooking, especially the cholent.

Over the next few days, I started noticing little signs of Pesach popping up throughout the building. In the elevators, fellow passengers would chat about the price of matzah this year, or how many people would be at their table, or what they were cooking. And as the elevator doors opened, there were warm smiles all around with the traditional exchange of "Chag Samayach" or "Happy Holiday".

At the underground garage door, with my keys and at least five bags of Passover groceries in hand, a car stopped and honked at me. I walked over to the driver's side – it was Rose. She wanted to wish me a happy and healthy holiday. We chatted for a few minutes about her week of cooking compared to my three gallons of chicken soup. I felt that "warm fuzzy" all the way back up to my apartment.
